We know, Mr. Speaker, that in very recent history, within a day's ride of this city, when a country having the greatest armies and the greatest resources of modern times was engaged in a great war, Mosby, with a few guerrillas, was able to carry on hostile operations in the sight of the Dome of this Capitol for months and years.

Mr. PATTERSON. And simply because he was operating in the midst of a friendly population.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Admitting that the army of General Lee occupied largely the attention of Mosby's foes, still he operated successfully against great odds, because he was sheltered by mountains and could concentrate or disperse his small force at pleasure. The country he occupied was practically depopulated. The Cubans have a still better field, which they seem to have improved for military operations with the torch.

I do not deny, Mr. Speaker, that these people may be engaged in a just cause. I do not wish to prejudice their character; far from it; but what I insist upon is that we ought to know something about them before we commit our people to an attitude which may involve us in the most serious consequences. War is a serious business. The most of us have had some experience of its hardships; and I know that if the people of this great commercial and agricultural country should become engaged in a foreign war its consequences may bring unutterable woe to millions of our countrymen. At this time we are entering manfully upon a struggle for our old dominance on the ocean; war would drive our commerce from the sea except in neutral bottoms. The flag of England, our great rival, would float above our trade, while our own, except on our ships of war, would disappear from the seas. The price of cotton, already low, would go still lower. The section of the country already desolated by war would be still further impoverished.

I should have no fear of Spain or any other country in the world in a physical conflict with our country so far as military success is concerned; but the waste and woes of even a successful war are irreparable. "There is nothing so melancholy as a victory won, except a victory lost," said Wellington. Just at this time, when we have not yet recovered from the horrors of civil war and their fearful consequences, I am not willing to take the risk of another war.

But, sir, I had wandered somewhat from the question which I had intended to discuss. I recur to it. A month has elapsed since I challenged my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] to give us reasons for this proposed action. A long debate has taken place elsewhere, and the newspaper press of the country has been engaged in sifting this matter from day to day and week to week, and yet it has nowhere and in no way appeared that the conditions prescribed by all the authorities for recognizing a new power as a belligerent have been fulfilled by these Cuban insurgents. Plantations have been burned and villages destroyed, but where have they made any real achievement in public war?

I ask again, after the interesting and learned argument of my friend from Illinois, what at last did he give us as the basis for our action here except the statement of an unknown author?

If these resolutions be postponed for thirty days I would be willing if at the end of that time we should not have more definite information as to the condition of the struggle in Cuba, to favor an official inquiry.

It must be noted, Mr. Speaker, that during the interval which has elapsed between the former debate in this House and the present time some discussion of this question has taken place at the other end of the Capitol, and it is now said that the House resolutions could not be passed in that body. I undertake to say, sir, that the Senate resolutions we are now considering would encounter indefinite obstruction in that body. The second sober thought has ensued, and the only way in which the gentlemen interested in this measure could bring it to a direct result was to take it away from the deliberative body at the other end of the Capitol and force it to a vote in the House of Representatives. In my opinion nothing on this subject would now pass the other House of Congress; and I believe that when the vote is taken it will be shown that many gentlemen here have reconsidered their views of this subject.

Allow me now to refer to the effect of a recognition of belligerent rights which has to some extent been defined by the gentleman from Illinois. When a force is recognized as a belligerent power, certain results ensue; but it must be remembered that in this particular case we are governed also by a treaty existing between this country and Spain, ratified and approved in 1795. That treaty contains a provision that if war ensues between Spain and any other power, she shall have a right to stop our merchantmen on the high seas and search them for articles contraband of war.

According to all the authorities that treaty would operate if we should recognize the force in Cuba as a belligerent power. At the present time it does not operate. On the authority of our courts, notably in the Itata case, originating in the late Chilean war, each party to a civil war has the right of access to our markets for the munitions of war. The Cuban people have that right at this time. They can buy all the munitions of war that they desire in our ports and there is no authority which can say them nay; and when those goods are shipped in accordance with law as merchandise, in a regular way, there is no power on earth, in the present state of things, that dare go on the decks covering those munitions of war and assert the right of search, or that dare look into that vessel's hold to see if she contains articles contraband of war.

The Cubans are buying munitions of war already in this country. According to reports in the papers they get their supplies from this country and from no other. Now, if we should recognize them as a belligerent power, while it might have the effect of giving them access to our ports with prizes captured on the high seas and the advantage of coming in and having their prizes condemned, a further effect would be to confer on the Spanish King and the Spanish Government the power to search every merchantman that might go from our ports in that direction.

In my opinion, the present condition of things is more advantageous to the people engaged in the struggle against the Spaniards in Cuba than would be their condition if we should actually give them recognition of belligerent rights. I need not pause to cite the authorities on which this conclusion is reached. I take it for granted that they are familiar to all lawyers and to all gentlemen who have studied this subject, so that I need not dwell upon the point. I have them here.

Mr. Speaker, I approach now a subject involving some delicacy, but I trust that I shall not be suspected of sectional bias or improper feeling when I refer to events of recent occurrence in our own history. Perhaps the matter is too recent to admit of the impartiality with which history will hereafter record the events following our great civil war. However, having had experience in this matter after the war was over amid the most trying circumstances of which I have ever read, I want to remind gentlemen that in the Island of Cuba there is a condition of things even worse than that which prevailed in the Southern States after the civil war.

Mr. Speaker, the race to which we belong is one which has the instinct of self-government. You may put a thousand or ten thousand of this race in a country where no flag floats—in some corner known as "no man's land"—and they will meet together and make government; they will establish order, they will pass laws, they will create courts. It is the proudest boast of our race that they have this great and glorious endowment. [Applause.] But, sir, there is no other race on earth that has it in so high a degree. There is the Spanish race, with whose descendants we sympathized in their struggle for freedom in the colonies to the south of us, and we gave them recognition.

And how have they prospered since their freedom has been established, in comparison with the country in which we live? Revolutions and anarchy have been their portion.

But my friend from Illinois said yesterday that the pure race settled in largest degree in Chile and in Cuba. But, Mr. Speaker, I answer that the example of Chile is not particularly inspiring, yet I presume that there are in that country very few persons of African descent. Mexico is the most progressive, perhaps, of all the Spanish-American Republics, but her most distinguished statesmen were not the descendants of the Spaniards; they were of the natives. Juarez and Diaz were of pure Indian blood.

A MEMBER. How about the Argentine Republic?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. My friend suggests the Argentine Republic as a successful Government. Mr. Speaker, I will not undertake to state anything with which I am not entirely familiar; but if I have not been misled and misinformed as to that country the best hopes of the Argentine Republic to-day consist in the development of that country by the sturdy Scotchmen and Germans who have gone there and taken possession of the wild plains. [Applause.]

But, sir, if the Spanish people, once so imperial in the world and having the noblest and fairest portions of the American continent, have lapsed from their proud position, it is not for us to reproach them in their decline. How is it with the other race which constitutes nearly half of the population of Cuba? We know that the African race, while perhaps it has admitted of larger growth and progress than many of us anticipated, has never yet manifested that genius for liberty and good government and free institutions which has characterized other races of the earth, but the misfortune is that in Cuba both of these races are trying to govern, each of which has never been eminent in the business of governing. According to information published in the papers, the struggle there pending is largely a race conflict. You have them there contending with each other for the mastery.

Now, my friend from Tennessee, who is doing me the honor to hear me, will see the serious situation in which those people in the Island of Cuba would at once be placed if we could go to the utmost hopes of some of our people and set them free from Spain. I for one, Mr. Speaker, have had enough of reconstruction; and I would not be willing to be a party to such an experiment under the conditions which are said to exist in that island. I confess that I have no definite information on the subject. I wish I knew more about it. I can respect a black patriot, or a Cuban patriot, or a mulatto patriot, or a patriot anywhere in the world if he has the capacity, the courage, and the disposition to organize and maintain good government rather than anarchy, revolution, spoliation, and barbarism. Let us not forget Haiti and San Domingo.

Mr. Speaker, I have rapidly gone over considerations which appeal to my judgment in this grave contingency. At this late hour I will not further detain the House. [Loud applause.]

Mr. QUIGG. Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, concerning the obligations that we owe to a friendly nation. I want to remind gentlemen that if there is any quality that has especially distinguished the attitude and conduct of the United States toward foreign countries it is respect for their rights and consideration of their susceptibilities. This has been due not entirely to the absence on our part of a selfish concern in their affairs, nor entirely to our preoccupation with our own, but a sincere desire in the American people, always and faithfully reflected by their Government, to do unto others as they would have others do unto them.

No nation can in fairness find less fault with us than Spain. For, with no interests in common, with many opportunities of controversy, and with our sympathies naturally attracted in directions antagonistic to her purposes, we have well and faithfully performed to the Government of Spain every obligation which from her own point of view is implied in the existence of friendly relations.

Spanish control in Cuba, Mr. Speaker, has been exercised at our sufferance for more than fifty years; and in the light of human nature, and in view of our commercial and other relations to that island, it is not too much to say that nowhere in history is there an example of such forbearance as we have shown to Spain. For we have been the life and breath of Cuba for all of half a century. We have opened her mines, builded her railroads, cultivated her plantations. We have taken into our markets substantially the whole of her surplus product; and although perfectly conscious that every dollar of the enormous sum annually wrung by Spain from the Cuban people is a tax on American capital and American enterprise, we have assumed and in good faith performed the part of a stranger to Cuba and a fair friend to Spain.

We have shut our eyes to public abuses and private wrongs compared with which the grievances that drove our fathers into revolution were an amiable caress. The evils against which the Cuban people have risen are not new. They began, sir, with the Spanish conquest. They result from the Spanish character. They follow from the Spanish point of view. They are inseparable from the colonial rule of Spain, and for the reason that the chance to perpetrate them have supplied the motive of Spanish control wherever it has been exercised on the soil of these continents. It is a government of the sword for plunder, and not of the head and heart for the high purposes of civilization.

We have known this, Mr. Speaker. Even while our officials were inditing proclamations forbidding us to manifest our sentiments about it, we have known it well. I mean that we shall have the credit, if in it credit can be found, for the fair and generous course our Government has pursued toward the Government of Spain. We have known that its treatment of its "Ever faithful isle" was that of a selfish oppressor; that by the denial of such political rights as are elementary in our system, by forms of taxation that would be to us utterly unendurable, it has earned the enmity of the people whose interests it should have dearly cherished. We have known that its continued exercise of sovereign power in Cuba was at conflict not only with Cuba's interest, but our own; that it exposed our trade to unfair exactions and our properties to the risk of ever-recurring political agitation, and that it interfered with the possibility of friendly and neighborly arrangements that would be highly beneficial to our commerce and our national position.

And above and beyond all of this, sir, we have known that the cause of the Cuban insurgents is the cause of human liberty; that they are applying the doctrines we have taught, acting on the motives we have inspired, and venturing their lives for principles we have declared to be the common birthright of mankind.

When we have read in the newspapers Presidential proclamations warning us against giving aid and comfort to the Cuban insurgents, we have known in our hearts that they deserved both. We have watched our cruisers chasing their little privateers on the high seas, profoundly desiring a fruitless result. And we have seen the powers of our judicial department bent to the undoing of the plans of their little bands of patriotic adventurers with less pride at the way in which the obligations of friendship work being met than mortification and regret at the prostitution to our Government to the office of a tyrant's policeman.

It may be possible to confuse the American people about the requirements of international customs and public law, but they know their own history, Mr. Speaker; they know the lesson it teaches and the duty it enforces. There is one obligation of a king to a king; there is another of a people to a people. The royalty that frowns at his royal cousin's rebels frowns to anticipate his own. Our function, we may well remember, is another and a nobler one. On our faith in free government, on our allegiance to the creed it proves, we are bound to listen when above the din of revolution the voice of an injured people cries out that they are, as of right they ought to be, a free and independent state. [Applause.]

I think it may be fairly claimed, Mr. Speaker, that in so far as any obligation to Spain exists, under the rules that govern the intercourse of nations, from the mere fact that we have no direct cause of quarrel with that country, it has been well and faithfully performed. The time has now come when we may fairly consider whether, in the situation that exists in Cuba, there is not an obligation to ourselves and to the Cuban insurgents. And I am frank to admit that I for one approach the consideration of that question from the point of view of one who fails to discover any reason whatever why any American community should longer be held in subjection to a European crown. [Applause.]

The progress of the human race is the one high purpose of government, and no political relation between two communities that has become injurious to either or that is not affirmatively beneficial to both is entitled to be perpetuated. To the maintenance of this doctrine and to its firm application within the limits of our natural and proper influence we are invited both by its propriety and by our interests. A new gospel has taken the place of the gospel of royal prerogative. The reign of the common people has come to all the earth, and with it an end to the fancy that a great and beautiful country, capable of maintaining millions of inhabitants in happiness and plenty, can forever remain the unchallenged property of a foreign prince, hundreds of leagues distant, merely because certain adventurers, owing allegiance to one of his ancestors, happened to discover it three or four centuries ago. It is not right; it is not reasonable. [Applause.] The day has dawned when things are, not because they have been, but because they should be. The sovereignty of Cuba resides, in justice, as it shall in fact, wherever the welfare of the Cuban people places it.

Mr. Speaker, I hardly think it worth while to discuss the moot question of whether the conditions that exist in Cuba are or are not a state of war; and even of less importance is the quaint contention of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], that belligerent rights should be denied the Cuban people because they are not fighting according to the rules of warfare laid down by the professors of international law! [Laughter.]

How are they fighting? Why, sir, they are fighting in a way that has enabled them within a single year to extend their authority from a single spot in a single province all over the island, until only three or four seaport cities remain to the Spanish Crown. They are fighting in a way that has increased their armies from a little band of 500 rebels into a magnificent force of 60,000 victorious, well-disciplined, and well-equipped soldiers. They are fighting in a way which has exhausted the resources of Spain to maintain an ineffectual and hopeless resistance. They are fighting in a way that has enabled one Cuban to contend successfully against three Spaniards; and not their bravery, nor their patriotism, nor the brilliant leadership of their generals, nor their unqualified success can be impeached by calling them brigands or by alleging that their methods are not the methods of civilized warfare.

The way to fight, I take it, is to fight to win. [Applause.] And that art, sir, the Cuban soldiery has learned in a degree that commands the admiration of all the world. Army after army has been sent into Cuba only to encounter defeat and humiliation. One general has displaced another, and yet, even with the assistance of a very resolute and very indefatigable press censor, who has converted defeat into victory upon innumerable occasions, who has captured Gomez and shot Maceo half a hundred times, who has exterminated more bands of Cuban rebels than there are palms in the Cuban forest, who has converted a maddened population into a loyal and contented colony, who has changed acts of infinite cruelty into acts of compassion and gentle mercy—even with his aid it has not been possible to conceal the fact that Cuba is forever lost to Spain. [Applause.] "This may not be war, sir; but I give you that it is no summer's holiday." [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the duty of the Government of the United States to bring the war in Cuba to a close. Nor do I urge this view solely for the sake of the Cuban people. We must bear in mind the fact when we come to vote upon these resolutions that the expense of this war is being paid, and must be paid hereafter, not by Spain, but by the American people. When Spain has lost Cuba, what has she lost? Simply an annuity. The invested capital engaged in devoloping the resources of the island is ours. Already our losses have been prodigious. Our mines have been closed. Our plantations have been burned. Our mills and railroads destroyed.

And even this measures only a fraction of the loss to us of what has already occurred in Cuba. Our principal sugar and tobacco supplies are obtained from this island. We must look elsewhere for them now and get them at a greater expense. And when the war is over it is from our reinvested capital and our recovered trade that the revenues must be drawn wherewith to pay an enormous accumulation of war debt. We have lost already more than we can afford, and more than we should endure. The ground upon which we can intervene is the just, firm, sensible ground of self-interest.

Gentlemen say that the intervention contemplated in these resolutions is a dangerous thing and may actually involve us as a principal in the conflict. That, of course, is mere speculation, as would be any reply that I might make. But, sir, I apprehend that a war with the United States is not an enterprise upon which any European nation, even the most sufficient, will lightly wish to engage. This is not a consideration, obviously, that entitles us to do an unfair or an ungenerous thing. On the contrary, it warns us, as the greatest force among the nations of the earth for progress and civilization, to act the part of an enlightened and honorable Government.

Our country is at peace to-day, and it is the duty of every citizen here or at home to strive to keep it so. We seek no quarrel. We make no causes of quarrel. Our time and energies are consumed in efforts to make the earth better and happier for our existence as a nation. For the European war lords, strutting about in their anxiety for combat, our sentiment, if not wholly respectful, is thoroughly charitable. But we have small interest in their ambitions, and only commiseration for the unfortunate people whose blood and treasure must soon become the price of their royal vanities.

The land we live in is a land of peace, of liberty, of progress, and of Christian civilization. But, sir, it must not become a land of pusillanimity. It must not forget its place in the family of nations, nor the duty which that place imposes, of commanding the respect and the influence of a power no less competent than it is benignant. The ends of peace are not promoted by cultivating among the people a sentiment of dull disregard for events in which are involved their commercial welfare and their national authority. The policy that would have us shut our eyes and ears to what is going on around us, that would have us allow our neighbors without protest or intervention to be subjected to humiliation and injury, to be despoiled of their territory, to be embarrassed in the exercise of their sovereign rights, to be confronted with a foreign fortification flying a European flag, is not possible to a nation of our responsibilities and our destiny. The United States are no longer a little string of Commonwealths along a little strip of coast. From the blue of their starry banner blaze not thirteen brilliants, but forty-five. They stretch across a continent and launch their fleets in either ocean. We must accept our part in the affairs of mankind, faithfully performing its duties and bravely accepting its consequences.

Although a war with the United States is not within the imagination, much less the purpose, of any responsible Spanish statesman, the consideration that should constrain us in the adoption of these resolutions is far remote from that. The end we seek to attain is peace, and not war; peace for a desperate and distracted people who have made the only choice that men can make when confronted with the alternative of abject slavery or revolution. They come to us with a petition for fair play. They do not seek to involve us in their quarrel. They ask no favor. They ask simply—and this is the significance of our resolutions—that we shall hold the scales even between them and their enemy. If we refuse this reasonable request; if we deny to them the position that their cause justifies and their valor has won; if we declare them to be wanton rebels, nay, plundering disturbers of the public peace, I say we shall be false to our history, false to the genius of our people, and false to the mission that it is ours to serve in the development of mankind. [Loud applause.]

Gentlemen say, do nothing. But we can not do nothing. We are not on earth to do nothing. [Applause.] And by doing nothing what they mean is to do something that is very bad indeed. By doing nothing they mean that we shall take the part of Spain as against this struggling colony, our neighbor and our friend. By doing nothing they mean that we shall take the part of despotism as against liberty. To do nothing is to accept the Spanish view—that the insurgents are not entitled to belligerent rights, that their armies are brigands, their ships pirates, and their flag not an emblem of national life, but of anarchy and of crime.

I am very frank to admit to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] that it is a matter of regret that the necessity to do something has been imposed upon the Congress of the United States. It would have been much better if the action contemplated in these resolutions had been taken by the Executive long ago, and not left to Congress [loud applause]; but his failure, which I submit to my Democratic friends is chronic and characteristic [laughter], properly to represent the views of the American people, does not excuse us from so doing. On the contrary, it renders our duty all the more imperative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIGG. I will yield to myself five minutes more time. I have charge of the time on our side. [Laughter.]

There are only one or two other points that I desire to notice.

It has been said that the Cuban forces fight in disorder. So did the farmer lads at Bunker Hill. They say that the Cuban Government frequently moves. So did the Continental Congress. They say that the Cuban armies are little bands of guerrillas. So were Marion's men. So was Sumter's brigade. So, indeed, were all the armies of the Revolution, the total number of whom were not half the force that is now engaged for Cuba free? I say to gentlemen that it is not for us, the sons of the ragged and forlorn miserables who froze at Valley Forge and starved in the swamps of the Carolinas, but out of whose glorious aspiration and noble daring free government was born, to sneer at the distresses through which the men of Cuba, brave with the same hope, fierce with the same passion, are fighting their hard way to freedom! [Great applause.]

Cuba ought to be free, Mr. Speaker; Cuba must be free. [Renewed applause.] Aye, and by the favor of a just God, to whom serfdom is hateful and all is good that tends to the advancement and improvement of His creatures, Cuba shall be free! [Loud applause.]

Mr. HITT. I yield thirteen minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

[Mr. WHEELER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on the 19th of March last a debate occurred in this House in which a circular issued by the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GIBSON, was used by the gentleman from New York, Mr. SULZER. The matter was the subject of newspaper comment and subsequently of a prosecution. All that I desire at this time is to call attention to a statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GIBSON, contained in the papers of yesterday afternoon and of this morning, and to make a statement of my own. It is proper to say that had I been present this morning and not detained by my work in the committee room, I would not at this hour interrupt the House. It is stated in the newspapers that on the trial it was developed by the testimony of the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GIBSON, that Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia, and not Mr. BARTLETT of New York, was the man who had obtained and furnished the circular in question.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that circular was given to me by a printer to whose office I went for the purpose of having some business transacted. It is true that without any purpose or intention of having the same used in debate, but as a mere matter of curiosity, I brought that circular to the House, and that it passed from my hands to the hands of other gentlemen and reached the hands of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER]. I had no concern or connection with his using it.

All I desire now to say is that I hold in my hand a statement—which it is not necessary to read, unless called for—from the printer, which shows that I came by this circular legitimately; that upon my going to his business place for the purpose of procuring some printing done for myself, he called my attention to these circulars and showed them to me. My recollection is—the printer's recollection is not positive about it—that he handed me one of them, and I simply said: "Can I have it?" and he said that I could. I brought it to the House in my pocket. Upon taking it out, as I said, it was passed from hand to hand.

Now, I want to say that this statement of the printer which I hold in my hand shows that I got that circular legitimately, with his knowledge and consent. The use made of it afterwards I am not responsible for. I desire further to say that I made no statement to anyone that the gentleman from Tennessee was sending these circulars to his constituents under his frank.

This is all I desire to say now, Mr. Speaker. I simply desired to call the attention of the House to the matter as it stands and to the statement which I hold in my hand signed by the printer who furnished the circular to me in order to show that my possession of it was legitimate and proper. Having said this, I have nothing further to say unless it should become necessary.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, all I wish to say is that I am satisfied from an investigation of the facts of the case that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] obtained that circular with the consent of the printer; and any implication to the contrary in the remarks I heretofore made I am glad to withdraw. I am also glad to learn from the gentleman from Georgia that he did not state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] that I was sending that circular out under my Congressional frank. I wish only to add that hereafter, when the gentleman from Georgia has a paper of that character, he be a little more careful of it when he is within reach of the gentleman from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Pardon me a moment. I did not distinctly hear the remarks just made by the gentleman; but I understand him to withdraw any statement that he has made to the House or elsewhere reflecting upon me or implying that I got that circular improperly.

Mr. GIBSON. I withdraw everything whatever that reflects upon the gentleman; I am glad to do so.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That is perfectly satisfactory.

CUBA.

Mr. TUCKER. I yield eight minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAHANY].

Mr. MAHANY. Mr. Speaker, it is an easy and a gracious thing to speak upon the popular side of any public question; but it is also at times wise and expedient to give some attention to the considerations involved in the opposite contention. I desire to say at the outset of my remarks that I intend to vote for these resolutions, but I vote for them under protest at the manner in which they have been brought before this House.

When these propositions, involving an important international question affecting the relations of comity between two Governments, were first brought before the House of Representatives, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. HITT] proposed to "railroad" them through on a debate limited to twenty minutes on each side. Now, I am a new member and a young one, and far be it from me to seem even remotely to criticise the methods of procedure that obtain in this House. But I have seen this legislative assemblage spend hours and hours in what appeared to me idle and fruitless disputation on subjects infinitely less important than this. Were I to cite an example, I might refer to discussions on such questions as whether eight or ten more pages should be employed in the service of this House, or whether the compensation for ten or twelve more charwomen should be included in a general appropriation bill. It would seem to me, therefore, that the way in which the Cuban question has been brought before the House of Representatives is neither in accord with the sentiment of the American people nor consistent with the dignity of this body.

I for one decline to believe that the applause of the galleries is the voice of the American people. I have an impression that the great body of thoughtful citizens in this Republic deprecate the war talk of this House and of the other legislative branch of the Government; and I am convinced that the conservative sense of this nation is against idle and officious intermeddling affecting relations of friendship between this Government and foreign powers.

I desire to say in addition that it has occurred to me that the House Committee on Foreign Affairs was established to prevent exactly the condition of things which that same committee has brought about on the floor of this House. By any proper conception of their duties they should have acted as a brake upon the war talk and war clamor which have disturbed and are disturbing the business interests of this Republic. As one of the majority loyal to that committee I must enter a protest against the manner in which, on the contrary, they have seemed to lead the procession of jingo enthusiasm.

I say I am going to vote for these resolutions, and why? Because, Mr. Speaker, I yield to no man in my devotion to human liberty or in my feelings of sympathy for the struggling patriots of Cuba. [Applause.] But, sir, between sympathy and international procedure, between impulse and government, there is a wide dissociation. What sort of a government are we asked to recognize? A government whose seat is a saddle, whose capital is a burro, whose chief of state is a general in the field. But let no gentleman understand me as casting any reflection on these conditions, because in that saddle may ride human liberty and on that burro may depend the hope of a nation's success.

But, my friends, by all the established rules of international law we recognize only such governments as those with which we may actually treat. The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] who spoke next before the last said we should brush aside all considerations of international law. In that expression he appears to voice exactly the methods and procedure of the committee of which he is a member, because, to judge from their attitude toward the international questions that have come before this session of the House, they are of the belief that we should dispense with the State Department altogether and carry on our foreign affairs by legislative precipitation!

We have here, Mr. Speaker, unquestionably a great duty to perform. But if we desired to place the sentiment of this country on record in behalf of the Cuban insurgents we could have done it in a manlier way by adopting straight and aboveboard resolutions of sympathy with that struggling people. But it was the duty of the Foreign Affairs Committee not to place us in the false position that if we voted against these resolutions of possible intervention we might thereby seem to exhibit indifference or hostility to the efforts of those gallantly struggling for national freedom. As the case now stands we are given no choice in the matter. We are forced to vote for the resolutions lest by proceeding along the established lines of international law and voting against them we should strike down a people that for over a year have won the admiration of the entire world by their heroic efforts to gain their independence, a consummation which it is the fervent hope of every patriotic American the Cubans may in the fullness of time secure. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the gentleman conducting the negative proposition promised me an opportunity to yield time on our side, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BUCK].

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, as both an explanation and perhaps apology for taking the floor at this late hour, not only of the day, but in the discussion of this question, I ask to have read to the House a telegram which was received yesterday within an hour after the pending measure had been taken under consideration by the House.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., April 3, 1896.

Hon. CHARLES F. BUCK:

We indorse and approve Cuban resolutions, and urge Louisiana Representatives to support them. Please communicate to Louisiana delegation.

THE DAILY ITEM,

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, the papers represented by those who signed that telegram are all the important and influential daily papers in the great city of New Orleans, published in the language of the land. I had it read, among other things, for the reason that it has been said upon this floor by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] that a change had come over the spirit of the American people since barely four weeks ago, when resolutions more vigorous, more comprehensive, than these we are now considering went through this House upon a wave of just sympathy with struggling humanity by an almost unanimous vote. If there has been a change of sentiment, that message testifies that the change—at least so far as the constituency from which it comes is concerned—is one of emphasis in favor of speedy and effective action by this House. The people which I have the honor in part to represent have always been in sympathy with the people of Cuba; but they have been thoughtful and conservative, and if to-day they send us this message, it is because I think they feel that the time has come when inaction ceases to be virtue and silence is no longer honorable.

As we are lying there at the very gateway to that island, close to the scenes of conflict, it may be that the cries of its despair and the wails of its uncertain hope strike the more deeply into our hearts, and the daily stories of outrage and atrocity begin to sound in the ears of American freemen like reproaches to our common humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, no one upon this floor has a higher admiration for the genius, the eloquence, or the judgment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] than myself, since it has been my fortune and my pleasure to sit on this floor and take instructions from him; and no one realizes or feels more comprehensively than I do the magnificence of Anglo-Saxon civilization. But the Anglo-Saxon people are not the only nations of this world whose hearts are inspired by the instincts of freedom. The Greeks were not Anglo-Saxons; the Gauls were not Anglo-Saxons, when a century ago, following in the spirit our philosophy, which declared the equality of man, they overturned the dynasties of centuries and put forever a check upon the power of kings and the traditions of feudal and Middle Age despotism. The instincts of liberty belong to the human heart, as a portion of its divine being and its immortal aspirations.

Mr. Speaker, I will not weary the patience of this House by repeating a word or a thought that has been expressed. We are told that we should hesitate, because we know not the condition of the Cubans. We do know that they fight, we do know that they lay down their lives upon their blood-drunk soil. Is not this war?

Nature's primeval state returns again
When man stands hostile to his fellow-men.

And we also know that if we have not all the knowledge we should have of their affairs it is because the power of Spain has surrounded that island, which lies in God's expanse of waters, with a wall of night which keeps the light of day and humanity from the struggle which its people are waging. [Applause.]

Some one has said, "Give us a month to deliberate; give us that time to study the situation further." What assurance have we that access will be given; that information will be true; that history will be correct? Accord to these people belligerent rights, yield to them the dignity, for the time being, of an equal nation upon the earth, and light will come from them and go to them, and then it will be demonstrated whether they are right or whether they are wrong. If we are to be wrong, let us err on the side of humanity; let us err in pursuit of the principles which we advocate and teach. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it is seriously contended that this House is dealing with a matter not within its jurisdiction. It seems, rather than take their share of responsibility, gentlemen would prefer to shift the question and consign it to the lazy-footed dignity of diplomatic donothingness or the calculating selfishness of politic statecraft. The contention seems supremely farfetched. The highest power of the Government, which controls all others, subject only to express constitutional limitation, the very branch which exclusively holds the power to declare war, should not have the power to declare the policy and shape the action of the nation when international complications confront us. The House has settled this question, not only in this case but by a hundred precedents. Argument would be the very idleness of declamation.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gist of all opposition to these resolutions is the contention that neither the magnitude nor the manner of the warlike operations are such as indicate the existence of a national autonomy entitled under the law of nations to be accorded "belligerent rights" by neutral powers. I have already conceded that possibly we do not know the whole truth; and I have shown the reason of it and expressed the belief that we know enough to bind us, in the interest of freedom and humanity, to give to the weak and the oppressed the benefit of the doubt.

As to the magnitude of the operations, I am content to rest the question on the information submitted to the House by the honorable the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. As to "the manner" of them, it may be true that no great battles have been fought, that no quarter is given or taken, and that no prisoners are exchanged; that no instances of magnanimity or forbearance on either side have come to light to soften somewhat the gruesome picture of a wholly savage warfare; that atrocious acts of outrage and cruelty are common incidents. Who is responsible? Spain is the master power of the two, and she claims to be the sole power. She dictates and determines the conditions of the conflict. On her and her alone civilization and humanity will place the responsibility for the consequences. Spanish methods in warfare against her colonies or foreign possessions are matter of history. If the Cubans practice "barbaric cruelty," it is not far to look for the masters whose "instructions" they but "better." The romantic and eloquent Castelar says: "Spain's Government is free, liberal, progressive." Granted; but, if so, only "at home."

Heaven forbid I or any Representative on the floor of this House should utter a word to offend the dignity, prejudice the interests, or question the honor of any nation with which this country is in peaceful and harmonious relations; but the facts of history are the property of mankind, and truth is the only thing that is permanent.

Spain is proverbially proud; but her pride is rigid with cruelty and her cruelty has reddened in the blood of fanaticism. Great, and perhaps free, at home, she has ever been unjust to her colonies; and in consequence has lost them all but one, and that one is irrevocably fixed in its determination to follow the others to freedom and independence.

She is ever the mistress, they the slaves; she rules to oppress and conquers to destroy. Somewhat over two centuries back a Duke of Alva gave to Brabant and Flanders the peace of the churchyard and the charnel house; and in our enlightened days a General Weyler will accomplish the same fate for Cuba if she gets no encouragement from the "outer world" until she places grand armies in the field, establishes custom-houses, and sends ambassadors to the nations of the earth.

It is said Spain will declare war against this country if these resolutions are adopted. That might be a great calamity, but Spain would have no just cause for war. Under the principles of both international comity and law the United States of America as a nation have the right to determine the fact of "belligerency," and to declare it, whether in the pursuit or protection of material interests or in the assertion of a principle of human liberty and justice.

Mr. Speaker, if that which we are about to do is right, it is right that we should do it even at the hazard of war. Life and property are not the best of earth's possessions; to nations, as to individuals, all is lost when honor is not maintained.

It would be idle to reason on the possible effects or foretell the probable consequences of a war between this country and Spain; it might be deemed vain boasting and perhaps convey the sting of offense, which is not intended; but every American schoolboy can play the prophet and predict its results.

In the nature of things, from the virtue of necessity, if you will, we know that if ever the flag of this great country is borne aloft against a foreign foe, it will never turn back to be furled in the gloom of defeat; it will wave high on the ramparts, even amid ruin and disaster, until at last, resplendent in victory and refulgent with the very blaze of glory, it shall plant itself on the achievement of an honorable peace.

The SPEAKER. According to the unanimous consent heretofore given, the House will now be in recess until 8 o'clock this evening, when the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MCCALL, will please discharge the duties of the Chair.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., resumed its session, with Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] five minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, to the student of history it is not a matter of surprise that the people of Cuba should now be engaged in a struggle for independence. A little more than one hundred years ago our fathers declared the great fundamental doctrine that governments derive their powers from the consent of the governed, and that before the law all men stand upon the plane of absolute equality. This cardinal tenet of republican institutions was not then, as I now recall, believed in or recognized by any government of the world. It was born on this continent, and grew into strength and power here, its champions being the descendants of the rugged pioneers who settled the New World. Around this doctrine their hopes and aspirations twined and clustered. To them it was the language of freedom, and it seemed as though the air, the mighty seas, and the rivers proclaimed it.

Mr. Speaker, it is unnecessary to recite the familiar history of the wondrous struggle which resulted in American independence. The doctrines of freedom and self-goverment have made marvelous progress since that period and have exercised a beneficent influence upon all the governments of the world. They have leaped the barriers of the Atlantic and substituted written constitutions for the despotic will of absolute monarchs. It should not, therefore, Mr. Speaker, be the occasion for comment or criticism when the people of Cuba, so closely allied to and identified with us in commercial relations, aspire to independence and self-government.

Sir, I am not familiar with international law, and do not claim to be advised as to its technicalities and intricate proprieties. It may be that under the strict terms of this code a state of war does not exist on the Island of Cuba which justifies the United States in according to the Cuban patriots belligerent rights. To the untutored layman, however, seeking only to know the truth and to deal justly, it would seem that the warfare now devastating that island rises far above the level of mere guerrilla strife. If not, Mr. Speaker, why is it that the armies of Spain, so repeatedly reenforced by veteran battalions, have thus far been unable to repress the people of Cuba in their efforts to achieve national independence? The spirit of American freedom seems to have been wafted to Cuba across the Gulf of Mexico, and I bid the Cubans godspeed in their efforts to establish a free and independent nation. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, possibly the situation may not be unvexed with doubt, but if doubts there be, I shall resolve them here and now in favor of the struggling patriots of Cuba, and cast my vote in favor of the Senate resolutions. [Applause.]

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes or more to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS].

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I design to do no more than simply to vindicate the vote which I shall give when these resolutions come before the House for adoption. I have considered this to be somewhat important upon my part, for the reason that when the resolutions that the House passed were up for a vote I voted for those resolutions. I voted for them, not because I approved the second and third resolutions by any means, but I was heartily in accord with the first of the resolutions, providing for neutrality between the two belligerents on the part of the United States. The first of the resolutions we have now proposed to the House for adoption is substantially the same as the resolution which was then adopted, and seems to be free from all substantial doubt as to its propriety.

This resolution provides for the neutrality of the United States between these two contending forces upon the Isle of Cuba. It is not the purpose of the United States by this resolution to intervene in any respect between these two contending parties, but to allow the struggle to go on with the understanding, nationally, in this country, and of course in others, that the United States is a neutral power, standing between these persons and acknowledging the belligerency of the forces engaged in the insurrection upon this island. So far I see no impropriety whatever in the resolution; but it (the second resolution) goes a step further than that; and the next step, to my judgment, is fraught with danger to the peace, the stability, the quietude, and the responsibility of the United States as a nation. It has been the policy of the United States at all times since the Government was formed to abstain from all entangling relations with European powers and not to permit European powers to acquire any standing or to exert any national policy or influence that is adverse to the institutions created by the people of the United States.

That was the declaration of policy of the first President of the United States. It has been observed faithfully from that time down to the present time; and the United States upon all occasions has abstained from interference with the domestic affairs of European Governments. Besides that, when the South American Republics had acquired what the United States believed to be their independence and the Holy Alliance was set on foot in Europe to reconquer those States and to aid or assist Spain in doing so, and to reestablish its government, the United States took decisive ground at that time, declaring substantially that the same policy which had prevailed in reference to foreign interference should also be applied to this newly existing state of things, and that the United States would not permit any European country to plant its institutions in this country or maintain them by force of arms, regarding that as a solemn menace to the stability and safety of our own institutions; and a counterpart or equivalent of this doctrine was also asserted, that the United States would not interfere adversely in the affairs of European people; and that has been a part of the policy of the Government, maintained from that time down to the present hour. And it is only a few weeks since that a solemn asseveration by this House and the body at the other end of the Capitol asserted that we should not interfere with the affairs of other nations, but we should not permit their interference with the affairs of the American nations to their detriment, or to an encroachment upon their soil.

Now, what has this second resolution provided for? Simply for intervention on the part of the United States in this struggle that is proceeding between the insurrectionists in Cuba and the Government of Spain. It is true that the resolution has been couched in very measured terms:

> That the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

That is perhaps not of itself, abstractly considered, any dangerous exercise of authority; but when we look back at the history of nations we see that slight causes, slight disagreements, have often precipitated the most remarkable and the most dangerous consequences between them. We see that it is a delicate subject for one nation to attempt to interfere in any manner in the internal affairs of another nation. And no one nation of a civilized character and standing can interfere with the affairs of another of equal standing, although of inferior authority, without exciting resentment on the part of the nation whose affairs are interfered with. And if the United States should undertake to exercise this authority, as the second resolution porposes, in the future, we can see at once that it is not going to result in the independence of Cuba or the success of the insurrectionists, but it is going to result in a feeling of exasperation on the part of the Spanish Government against the Government and people of the United States. They are already excited very much, and an interference of this character might exasperate that excitement beyond a point of all reasonable restraint and precipitate upon our country a series of consequences that every member of the community would deplore.

We can not for ourselves portray with certainty what would be the effect of such interference by the President of the United States. It would be the exercise of a new and undefined authority. It never has been recommended or acted upon under similar circumstances, and it is not to be expected that it can be exercised now without exciting animosity and resentment on the part of the Spanish people. It is true that that people are inferior in power, vastly so, to the people of the United States; that their resources have been seriously drained in the contest that has been going on for over a year upon the Island of Cuba; but it is to be remembered that in controversies of this character other nations may come in to sustain the hostilities that Spain may enter upon toward this country and produce a series of disasters that we can not now either anticipate or measure.

It is necessary in matters of this kind for every nation to take counsel of its own prudence and not to allow itself to transcend the bounds of propriety in reference to the affairs of other nations—certainly not to place itself in an equivocal position whereby its intentions and its influence may be misunderstood, provoking national resentments by which war may be brought precipitately upon the country interfering in this manner without any suspicion of the danger lurking beneath the efforts attempted to be made. It is because of the danger that may lurk in the exercise of this authority, that may accompany it or follow it, that it strikes me that these resolutions as they are now combined together ought not to receive the vote of this House.

If the first resolution could be presented to the House separately and distinctly, simply acknowledging the belligerency of Cuba and asserting the neutrality of the United States between the insurrectionists and the Government of Spain, I should see no objection to that, because it could not be regarded, in any possible view, as an effort on the part of the people of the United States or their Government to interfere in the deplorable condition of affairs existing on the Island of Cuba at the present time. It would be nothing more than a declaration that the United States generously desired to see the insurrectionists upon that island enjoying the rights of belligerents, so that they might be protected against the allegation that they are criminals or traitors to the Government of Spain because they have arisen and endeavor to overthrow the government of the island.

There would be no harm, apparently, nor any danger in declaring that to be the position of the people and the Government of the United States. There would be in that no reason for Spain's taking offense. But when it comes to the question of intervention, even possible intervention, we can see at once that this is the first step, which may result later in forcible intervention and bring about a warlike condition of things between the two Governments, and we can not be too cautious in the exercise of authority of such a character. It is because of the danger that may follow the attempt on the part of the United States to interfere to secure the independence of Cuba even by the aid of our moral influence that it strikes me that this second resolution is improper in its character.

When I found on consultation with the gentleman who introduced the resolutions that no vote was to be had upon them separately, but that they were to come before the House and be either accepted or rejected as a whole, I was astonished; for while the doctrine embodied in the first resolution is unobjectionable and might be entirely acceptable, the other, as qualifying the first resolution and this exercise of neutrality on the part of the United States, is such as to indicate certainly a possibility, and indeed a probability, that, by our attempting to interfere through the action of the President in the existing situation between the insurrectionary forces and the Government of Spain, there may be precipitated a war that would be dangerous, lasting, and destructive to many of the interests of our country.

And, Mr. Speaker, we should receive no equivalent, no recompense, for that state of things brought about by our intervention in the dispute that is now existing between Spain and its subjects upon the Island of Cuba. In case of war it would become an independent assault against our Government, against our people, against our seacoast cities, and no person can measure in advance the extent to which the injury might be carried resulting from hostilities carried on against us by Spain and very likely to be joined in by other European powers.

Such might be the result, and where would be the recompense, where would be the equivalent, coming to this country as the result of such an intervention, if it should by any possibility produce such consequences as I have indicated? It is true we may exercise a moral influence without offense. It is true we place ourselves thereby in a position of hostility to Spain; but if that action on our part should lead to another and to still another and finally to a state of war, certainly there would be no equivalent that the people of the United States could receive, no recompense that would in any considerable degree counterbalance the resulting disadvantage and the injury. It is for these reasons, Mr. Speaker, that I desired to present my views to the House as justifying, and not only as justifying, but as requiring that, as these resolutions that the House, when they are presented for adoption or rejection, must be presented together, they shall be voted down, and I hope will reject the resolutions.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BAKER].

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the resolutions which this House in its wisdom adopted a few weeks since were much more in accord with my individual views than those which I presume will be adopted on Monday next—the resolutions which have come to us from the Senate. There seems to be a diversity of opinion among the members of this House in regard to what the sentiment of the country is. More than that, there appears to be a diversity of opinion in regard to our duty as a nation in regard to this subject. I believe, sir, that if the 175,000 citizens of my district were appealed to to say whether, on this question, I should cast my vote in the interest of human freedom by voting for these resolutions and thereby expressing my sympathy with the cause of humanity, 174,999 of those citizens would say, "Vote for those resolutions."

But, Mr. Chairman, I go a little further in my sentiments than the resolutions now before us. I have no disposition to criticise the committee for what they have seen fit to report to us. They are doubtless better informed on this question than we can possibly be. But, sir, we know not only that there is existing to-day in the Island of Cuba a state of war, but there is existing a very inhuman war. We know that Spain has been using her great power for the last twelve or fifteen months to subdue those people, and that at this particular time she is not in actual possession and control of more than one-fifth of that island. It is impossible for us to know just what the present condition is there. But, sir, I believe for myself in the declaration that was adopted by our forefathers. I believe in a government of the people. I believe in the formation of those laws and the recognition of those rights which will guarantee to a people that they shall be at least treated in a humane way.

If Cuba had in the past been treated as citizens of any government should have been, our duty at the present time would perhaps be different. But we know that they have been terribly oppressed. We know that people of the Anglo-Saxon or English race would not have tolerated what they have been compelled to submit to for years past. We know that history proclaims to the world that they have been debased; that they have been taxed beyond all reasonable power of endurance; that they have been denied the right of trial by jury; that they and their families have been deprived of the essential rights of freemen. In consequence of being thus treated they have seen fit to rise up in rebellion.

Sir, on this question there is a law as broad as humanity, as deep as human affection, that appeals to the American people to-day in such a way that we dare not do otherwise than express for the people of Cuba our sympathy. I can not conceive how it is possible for any American citizen to allow his imagination to be so worked upon as to induce him to believe that we shall give Spain any cause of offense if we should try to use our good offices in bringing to a peaceful termination the struggle now being carried on in Cuba. If two men are engaged in deadly conflict and a third person tries to interfere in order to separate the combatants, it is barely possible that they will not appreciate his efforts; but if he steps in with power enough to command the peace, not only will they honor him, but every other man must do the same.

That is the condition, as I understand it, existing in Cuba to-day. The people now struggling there are not those that have had the advantages of education and other improving influences such as we have had. In their struggle to-day they are acting with the best light that they have been able to enjoy. They see a great nation on the north of them that is enjoying the blessings of civil and religious liberty, the blessings of national prosperity. They see themselves, on the other hand, in a condition of abject slavery. They have risen in rebellion; they have appealed to the God of battles; they have gone forth to make the sacrifices that only true, brave, and courageous men dare make in order that the cause of liberty and humanity may move onward and upward. [Applause.] Sir, I would dare to say to those people—and I do not believe that I am the only member of this House ready to say so—"In God's name we wish you success in your undertaking; we give you all the words of encouragement that it is in our power to give." [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that we should have had presented to the two Houses of Congress resolutions recognizing Cuban independence. I would be only too glad to vote for such resolutions. I have no idea that there would be any danger of our being obliged to back up that act by force of arms. But, sir, he whose cause is founded in righteousness and truth is doubly armed; and if it should be necessary in the onward march of the nineteenth century that this great Government of ours should take a stand in the cause of humanity, let us bid those who are struggling in that cause Godspeed; let us give them the assurance of our cordial sympathy, our moral support, in the struggle.

How far we should go in extending our sympathy and aid to people struggling as the Cubans now are I know not. Possibly I am too radical in my views on this question. But I say this, that in adopting these resolutions we take a step which I have no doubt future generations will approve. More than that, I believe that the cause of humanity, by reason of our action in behalf of Cuba, will take new vigor; the cause of education and of civil and religious liberty will receive an impetus that will help forward the progress and elevation of the human family. Let us, then, take this step. Let us give Spain the means of knowing just how we do stand on this question. That is exactly my feeling in regard to this subject.

Let us meet the issue like men; and I will take that issue, so far as my people in Kansas, and particularly my district, are concerned, and have not a doubt that every member of the House will be more than satisfied with the result that attends the passage of these resolutions, because we have assurances from the chairman of the committee, assurances that ought to be fully satisfactory to the members of the House, that the resolutions will accomplish the happy result we all so much desire. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I ought to have kept quiet during this discussion, but some things that have been said against the passage of the resolution induce me to occupy the floor for a short time, and I do not think it would be out of place for me to give the reasons that actuate me in voting for the passage of the resolution.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] on yesterday said that a picture was presented to the members of this House, a horrid picture of a man suffering death by a garrote, which was sent out for the purpose of trying to create a false sentiment of sympathy. I saw that picture. It is the execution of a man in a Spanish prison in the Island of Cuba; not that he had committed murder or a foul crime of any kind, but simply a human being brought to death in that barbarous fashion because he had—after his people for over three hundred years had been struggling to gain their liberty—saw fit to join the Cuban patriots and had been captured as a prisoner of war and was taken to prison and was put to death as there exhibited. That is the reason that that picture was sent throughout the country; not to show how they put to death men guilty of heinous crimes, but to show how they deal with men who desire to secure their liberty. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there is no nation on the face of this globe which will countenance putting political prisoners to death with that horrible instrument that deserves any consideration at the hands of any civilized or any Christian government. [Loud applause.] During the war of the great rebellion, at a time we classed our brethren across Mason and Dixon's Line as rebels and recognized them only as insurgents, and while they were captured at the first fight—Bull Run—in a war that continued for four long years in this country, a war in which 600,000 men went down into untimely graves, no man in that strife who had lifted his arm against this Government, no insurgent or rebel, lost his life except in battle. Not a solitary man during that long war was executed, either with the garrote, or by a rope around his neck, or by any other means. We recognized during that struggle that they were blood of our blood and flesh of our flesh, and, remembering the teachings of Him who came into the world eighteen hundred years ago to teach men and point the way of eternal life and how to live in this world as citizens and as men, remembering His teachings, recognizing the principles taught by Him, I say that no man in that great struggle was put to death in this barbarous manner. That is one reason why, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the resolution.

Now, there is another reason. I claim that this Government, as a government, has a right to recognize any people in any part of the world who are struggling for their liberty where a state of war exists. I do not propose as a member of the American Congress to ask Spain, that superannuated old giant, that bronze corpse, a cipher among the alphabet of the nations, whether she likes it or not. The only question to me is, is it right? I believe we ought to recognize the Cuban patriots who are struggling against the Spanish Government with every prospect of success, and I propose to vote for these resolutions, be the consequences what they may. [Prolonged applause.]

I was surprised to hear in this American Congress in the past few days that this great Government of ours had no right to give to the Cubans belligerent rights, and to do so was an insult to Spain—a declaration of war. Why, sir, during the late war, as we have been told in the debate here, before a battle was fought on land, the Government of Spain, 8,000 miles away from us, knowing but little about us, knowing nothing about our domestic troubles, with indecent haste poked her nose into our affairs and gave to the Confederate States belligerent rights. Did this Government recognize that act as a cause for war? Did we declare war against Spain? No. And why? Because this Government recognized that all the Governments of Europe, if they saw proper, had a right, if they believed that a state of war existed, to recognize the Confederate Government as belligerents; and I propose that this Government of ours, so far as my vote and influence are concerned, shall give to the Cubans all the rights of belligerents, with the hope that they may gain their independence in the near future. [Applause.]

Now, I want to make a reply, in the very brief time allotted to me, to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], and I will read a short extract from a speech of his delivered in the Fifty-third Congress, and as I read this extract from his speech I want you simply, in your own mind, to insert the word "Cuba" in place of "Hawaii," and see where he stood in the Fifty-third Congress, when he was ready to involve our Government in a war if necessary for the purpose of giving these Hawaiian people their freedom. I agreed with him in that fight, and I was ready to vote for his resolution if an opportunity was given, and I am with him on that controversy. The reason that he then set forth in support of his action on the Hawaiian question, Mr. Speaker, influences me in giving my support to the resolutions now pending, and I shall vote for the report of the conference committee.

Mr. TUCKER. Will not my friend allow a man time for repentance?

Mr. PICKLER. We hate to see him fall from grace. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHON. Now, Mr. Speaker, you will find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Fifty-third Congress, second session, volume 144, page 8003, the following:

> Mr. BOUTELLE. * * * I understand further, Mr. Speaker, that it has been the uniform policy of the United States to be prompt and earnest in encouraging and recognizing all movements tending toward the establishment of free republican governments, in whatever parts of the world they may be. I understand this to have been the settled policy of the United States from the foundation of this Republic. I need not enforce upon the mind of the House the fact, it seems to me, that the establishment of a republic in the Hawaiian Islands is an event that, under all the circumstances, appeals to the sympathy of the people of the United States with the most peculiar and extraordinary strength.

And a few days afterwards he offered a joint resolution (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, second session Fifty-third Congress, volume 144, page 8010) "congratulating the people of the Hawaiian Islands on their peaceable assumption of the powers of self-government and recognizing that Republic as free, sovereign, and independent." That was the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] in the Fifty-third Congress. He has departed from that. I say that the doctrine laid down by the gentleman in that speech is sound American doctrine, and I am willing to vote for the resolutions on the speech he made in the Fifty-third Congress, a part of which I have just read. [Applause.]

Mr. MAHANY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. MAHANY. Do you not recognize the difference between a government which has only a general in command of an army in the field and a government established and able to maintain law and to preserve order?

Mr. MAHON. Well, Mr. Speaker, these people fifteen months ago commenced with three or four thousand struggling patriots, without arms or munitions of war. They have grown until to-day they have a magnificent army of from fifty to sixty thousand men. They have fought their way from one end of that island to the other, and have hovered around the capital of Cuba. They have whipped one of the great generals of Spain and sent him home under a cloud, and, mark my word for it, they will whip the man who is in command of the Spanish armies on the Island of Cuba to-day. [Applause.] They have kept the field against an army of 120,000 well-trained Spanish troops. They have never had a dissension in their ranks, they have never had a deserter from their ranks, and for fifteen long months they have contended successfully against this well drilled and disciplined army of Spain. Yet you state to me to-day that they are not entitled to the same recognition that those people were in Hawaii.

Mr. Speaker, we are told that the Cuban army is composed largely of mulattoes, men not fit to govern themselves. I assert that as a class of men they stand much higher in intelligence and morality than the majority of the people of the Hawaiian Islands, and are at least as well fitted for self-government. I suppose if the Hawaiian Islands had belonged to Spain, a great deal of the patriotism and fighting spirit that almost submerged the Fifty-third Congress would never have been heard of. Mr. Speaker, this great Republic is the foster parent of all republics in the Western Hemisphere, and we must, in the language of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], "be prompt and earnest in encouraging and recognizing all movements tending toward the establishment of free republican governments." The passage of these resolutions is not a declaration of war. As a great nation we have a perfect right to give to Cubans belligerent rights. If Spain sees fit to declare war, she must take the responsibility and the consequences. The conflict will be short and decisive. Cuba will belong to the United States and Spain will have learned a lesson she will never forget. One more victory will be won over despotism and inhumanity. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAHON. If there is no objection, I should like to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I could have completed them in about five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I think general leave to print has been extended.

Mr. QUIGG. Oh, no; I do not think so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to my colleague [Mr. OTEY].

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, it has been said that doctors practice on their own patients, but that members of Congress, especially when they are on the Cuban resolutions, practice on the patience of others. I propose to take advantage of that prerogative for the few minutes allowed me.

There is a story told of a man and his wife who quarreled as to what they should have for dinner. The one wanted terrapin stew and sherry, and the other wanted canvasback ducks and champagne. They wrangled and quarreled, and finally compromised on cabbage. [Laughter.] We have had the terrapin stew of the Senate and the canvasback duck of the House, and now we have come in and compromised on cabbage, in the form of this resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the gentleman will permit me, I should like to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. OTEY. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask you if you have not misstated the facts? Do you not mean that they have had the canvasback ducks at the White House? [Laughter.]

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I can only answer that question in this way. It is said that Chief Justice Chase was talking to a nigger one day. I mean no disrespect to the colored people by saying "nigger." It is a word most appropriately derived from "niger," meaning black. He said to this coon—negro, I mean [laughter]—"I have always thought that it was very strange that a coon wore his fur on the outside. When I have a coat with fur on it, I generally put the fur on the inside. I find that it is warmer to wear it that way, and I do not see why a coon should not wear it in that way. Why is it?" "Well," said the negro, "you'd know if you was de coon." [Laughter.] "Why?" asked the Chief Justice. "Because," said the negro, "you would have more sense." Without reflecting on your intelligence, sir, and with the utmost of pleasantry, you have a complete answer. [Laughter.]

I never visit the White House. I am a spring chicken of this House and do not go there unless sent for to be consulted about great matters of state, and I do not suppose the gentleman from Michigan does. I do not know anything about what they have there to eat. But a spring chicken had better stay away. I have only been there once or twice, and I do not know that I will ever go there again. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, we hear a great deal of talk about war. I am opposed to war. Thirty-five years ago I talked about war, and I was red hot for it. [Laughter.] But, sir, in the language of that great man—I do not know whether I pronounce it right or not—veni, vidi, vici; I came. Yes, sir; I "came" to the front, and for four years I stayed there. I remained there. No surgeon's certificate, sir, ever sent me home; and in the language of a great judge in Virginia, a friend of my friend Mr. TUCKER, no one sent me there to have "the perpetual enjoyment of the rascally immunity of bombproof security." [Laughter.] "I was not to be heterogeneously bamboozled by the unsophisticated audacity of any man," as an old soldier said. [Great laughter.] No, sir; I was not; but veni, I say, I came. Then vidi, I saw. Yes; I saw rebels there in thousands, with belligerent rights. I know, gentlemen, that you do not know yet which side of this question I am on [laughter], although you can guess which I was on then. I will get to that presently. The trouble about it is that I have not been able to tell which side a great many now are on, because they have been talking about national law, and international law, what General Grant, Henry Clay, Madison, and Monroe said, and all that sort of thing, of which the average Congressman knows but little.

Yes, sir; I saw the rebels in thousands and thousands, with belligerent rights, marching toward a gallant foe. I saw them charge, I saw them stand, I heard them yell, I heard the thunder of their cannon, maintaining belligerent rights. It is not out of place, therefore, for me to say lastly that, after veni and vidi, vici, I conquered. But, sir; not until the big guns at Fort Delaware, where I had been invited to stay a few days by Uncle Sam [laughter], just one month before the surrender—not until these big guns thundered there and informed me that the name of Appomattox had been made immortal, and that the great Army of Northern Virginia had surrendered, making the name of Ulysses S. Grant immortal, not until then did I conquer; and then I conquered what? My insatiable desire for renown as a belligerent! [Great laughter.] That time came and I bowed to the inevitable. I confess, sir, that ever since then I have had no more thirst for gore. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, why all this talk about war, and all this talk about rights and principle, international law and justice, and all such things? Mr. Speaker, just let us see what would be the application of principle, right, and international law under certain circumstances. Let us suppose a case—you all would not suppose it was a supposable case—but just suppose a case [laughter], and that is, suppose that the Northern States had seceded and that the Southern States had undertaken to maintain the Union. What would have been the result? Exactly the same as it was. [Great laughter and applause.] Secession would have succeeded then. No doubt about that. You all had too heavy guns for us and too many people, and it mattered not which was abstractly right, the same causes would have produced the same effects. Therefore, if the cause of the Union had been the whale represented by the Southern States, then it would have been the whale that the fish swallowed, instead of the fish that the whale swallowed. See? There is no question about that. Now, sir, nobody doubts this proposition of international law; but the pertinent inquiry now is, what has this to do with Cuba? [Great laughter.] About as much as the speeches against these resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TUCKER. I yield five minutes more to my colleague.

Mr. OTEY. Thanks. I am much more pleased than I make out I am. Well, sir, I was going on about the question of right and international law when I was hammered out, etc. These things of right and justice in international affairs are settled by the arbitrament of arms. That settles the question, as a general thing. Of course secession was wrong, because the arbitrament of arms settled it. I am not going to discuss secession, gentlemen, not only because I know that has nothing to do with Cuba, but because it is, as we know, a new question. In dealing with Cuba we should remember that the United States does not follow the example of other nations in starting anything. We do not need to follow the example of other nations; and we do not want to wait to see what England is going to do, thank the Lord. [Laughter.] We ought not to wait to see, and I hope we will not wait to see, what England is going to do about finances or any other thing. I hope we will make precedents instead of waiting for them. I do not believe with some of my friends on the other side of this Chamber that the people of the United States can whip the whole world, but I do not believe that the whole world can whip the United States [great applause and laughter], and hence we should act independently and courageously.

Now, sir, I am not like that gentleman who delivered a Fourth of July oration on one occasion, when he said that the American eagle had plumed her wings and soared aloft and had scanned the whole world and then "lit" in America, with one foot in the Atlantic Ocean, the other foot in the Pacific Ocean, with her tail flopping in the Gulf of Mexico, and picking grass in Canada. [Great laughter.] No, sir; I do not believe that. But I do believe, sir, that the United States is big enough to take care of herself in maintaining any opinion which it may express through us in this House—I being one of "us"—and capable of giving belligerent rights to Cuba [great applause], even though they be rebels.

My time is so limited that I will have to skip a great deal of my speech. [Laughter.] I was somewhat inclined to the other side when this question was first before us, and had prepared a great speech on that occasion. I lost it coming down here [laughter], and I think Mr. TUCKER or Judge TURNER found it, and I believe you will probably hear part of that speech to-night from my colleague, Mr. TUCKER. [Laughter.] However, after hearing the arguments of the gentlemen against the resolutions, I was by them persuaded to go for them and for the belligerent rights of Cuba.

Now, to come down to the point, everybody that has spoken on the other side has suggested something about war. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with people that are struggling for their independence. I sympathize with rebels. I was a rebel once myself. [Laughter.] In fact, I do not see how any of us on this side can help sympathizing with rebels. [Laughter.] The people of the United States being a free people, the freest in the world, ought to want to see everyone else free, and our neighbor, Cuba, as we know, is not free. I do not believe that the United States ought to go to war about Cuba, and I have not the slightest idea that they are going to do so. However, I am beyond the military age myself, so it would not make so much difference to me personally if they did. [Laughter.] It might increase my sugar bounty. But we shall not go to war. I do not believe we ought to meddle with other people's business. Of course we should not. But no one has suggested that we should interfere with other people's business. Our opinion is our business.

It is true something has been said about intervention, but that was in a pickwickian sense. The real question here is whether there is war in Cuba; not whether we are going to war. Is there war in Cuba? If so, these resolutions are right. If not, they are wrong. That is all there is in the whole matter. Cuba began this attempted revolution in 1849, and she failed. She took it up again in 1854, and she failed again. She made another attempt in 1873, and she failed. If she fails again this time, some of these wise gentlemen, like my friend Mr. TUCKER and others who have spoken here, will say, "I told you so." [Laughter.] Well, if she does fail, we shall not be in any worse fix than Spain and all the nations of Europe were in when we of the South failed, because they all recognized us—everyone of them. [Great laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, as I do not expect to deliver the speech that my friend has referred to [laughter], I will yield him five minutes more of my time.

Mr. OTEY. I am much obliged to my colleague. As I said before, gentlemen, I expected to practice upon your patience on this occasion, but I have never done it before except once, and then there was nobody in the House. I beg pardon; I ought to have said Hows. [Laughter.] We are not inviting war by these resolutions. What are we doing? We are simply expressing our opinion. Well, has not the House of Representatives of the United States a right to express its opinion? Do not we do that out here in the cloakrooms, and everywhere else? [Laughter.] Did not we express our opinion the other day about Mr. Bayard? Of course we did. And has Mr. Bayard got mad about it and resigned? [Laughter.] You recognized him as a belligerent then. It was harmless. Did it hurt anybody? No, sir; not at all. Cuba is not going to get mad about this. Is Spain going to get mad about it? What if she does? What are we doing? As I said before, only expressing our opinion, which is an inalienable right. [Laughter.] We are not inviting war, as I said before.

What do these resolutions say? In all this war talk and this talk about international law gentlemen have lost sight of these resolutions. A friend with whom I talked a few minutes ago did not know which were the resolutions. He thought the ones that were struck out were the resolutions we were considering, and that the ones that we are considering were those that were struck out. [Laughter.] I do not believe he is the only man here who was in that state of mind. I did not know which were the resolutions myself until I picked up this copy. [Laughter.] We say in these resolutions that in our opinion a condition of public war exists in Cuba. Let us consider that for a moment. Can anybody deny that war exists in Cuba? Does anybody deny that war exists there—I do not say public war, but war? What is the meaning of war? War, as they tell me in the dictionary, is an old English word which originated in the laws of Canute—you all know who Canute is. You remember Canute. [Laughter.] It originated from the word "w-e-r-r-e" in old French, and in modern French guerre, and it means vexation, strife, confusion, broil. The verb means to embroil, to bring into confusion, to entangle.

Do not all of these conditions exist in Cuba? They certainly do. Well, if they do exist it is clearly war, and if war at all, it must be public, not private war. Now, that is what this resolution says, that in our opinion a condition of public war exists there. If war does exist in Cuba, and if it is public war, you ought not to be afraid or ashamed to say so. [Laughter.] You ought to say so if you really think so. The question is, Does it exist? It certainly does exist. I have demonstrated that so conclusively that even my colleague, Mr. TUCKER, can not gainsay it. [Laughter.] My argument has been complete in this respect, and the authorities I have given can not be questioned. [Laughter.] Again, if public war does exist in Cuba, between whom does it exist? It exists between Spain and her subjects (so called) in Cuba, who are supposed to be rebels. Now, if war exists between Spain and those people, then that is just what this resolution says. It says that war exists between the Government of Spain and the Cubans, and has been for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba. The question now arises, Has it been maintained? Well, it looks very much that way. [Laughter.] This is a war carried on as other wars, for either the purpose of advantage, revenge, for lust of gain, territorial possession, race and sentiment, civil liberty, or some kindred cause. Those are the objects for which wars are generally carried on, and when a war is so carried on it is a public war, and such a war clearly exists between the Government of Spain and the people of Cuba.

The fact that 100,000 men are under arms, all regular soldiers of Spain, with a powerful navy, experienced generals, all the munitions of war at its beck and call, and still held in Cuba, when there is no war there, is astonishing if not absurd. Who can assert under such circumstances that war does not exist in Cuba, and public war at that?

When this resolution says this, it could not have uttered or proclaimed a more potent truism than if it had said that a state of public war does not exist in the United States of America.

How should we act, then? The resolution says we should maintain a strict neutrality. Anything wrong about that; if so, what?

Now, as to the second resolution I shall have very little to say. It is true that some are in favor of the first and yet object to the second resolution. Why, this is putting the cart before the horse. The objectionable part, if any, is in getting ourselves in trouble by maintaining perfect neutrality, thus according to both contending parties belligerent rights. The second is so very inoffensive that I would as soon have it stricken out as not, but not for the same reasons as those expressed by others on this floor. It is so harmless that I would not object to its being stricken out. But I suppose there is something in the mist surrounding international law which hides the great affront which such a resolution gives to a friendly power.

Why, I would vote for just such a resolution to be addressed to England in regard to Ireland. What does it say? Only that our friendly offices should be offered to Spain for the recognition of the independence of Cuba. Why, I would vote for a constitutional amendment that the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to every Government for the recognition of any of their people who were struggling to become free and independent, if such struggle develop to such proportions as to keep an army of 100,000 men a year or more trying to quell the disorder. Strip these resolutions of all war talk, of the dark mantle of legal lore and international erudition which has been thrown over them and turn on the search light of common sense, and we find them unadorned but in all their beauty, a great nation telling struggling humanity everywhere that it sympathizes with them, that they have a right to fight for liberty, that it will ever espouse the cause of freedom, and dare to tell their oppressors that our hearts are with the oppressed, and we tender our good offices to secure them just such rights as those for which we suffered and fought and which we secured.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hows and you all for allowing me to practice upon your patience so long. I am not half through. I could have demonstrated my position beyond a doubt and could have secured a unanimous vote in favor of these resolutions if I had had a little more time. I could see the work of conversion manifesting itself. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I will ask my friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] whether he desires now to occupy further time on his side?

Mr. TUCKER. There is no one on this side of the House who desires to speak now.

Mr. QUIGG. Then I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN].

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I had not hitherto expected to say a word on this question, although my convictions upon this subject have from the beginning been settled. It is a question upon which, fortunately for myself (differing in this respect from some others), I have never had any doubt in my own mind.

Sir, we approach these resolutions to-night in a somewhat different attitude from what we would occupy if this were absolutely a new question, or if the question were whether we should recognize the rebels in Cuba as belligerents or should do nothing. Now, sir, the Senate has adopted, by a large majority, resolutions in favor of recognizing the Cuban patriots as belligerents. When those resolutions came up for consideration in this House we passed a somewhat different and stronger proposition, substantially, however, the same. We have had a committee of conference; and the question to-night is whether we shall adopt the resolutions as agreed on by that committee or repudiate the action that has been taken and defeat the committee's report.

We are now so placed that we must speak either for or against the patriots in Cuba. We must give to the Cubans struggling for independence our moral influence, our encouragement, our indorsement, or we must give countenance and encouragement to Spain in her effort to crush this struggling people. In adopting these resolutions, as I have no doubt we shall do next Monday, this great Government, with all its influence, will voice, as I believe, almost the universal sentiment of our people and indorse the efforts of a people battling for freedom on a neighboring island, bravely striving to throw off the yoke of perhaps as grinding a tyranny as has cursed mankind in modern times. If, on the contrary, we should vote these resolutions down, what would be the effect? Who would be encouraged by our action? What kind of word should we send forth to the world? How would our action be looked upon by the Cubans? How would it be looked upon by the Spaniards? How would it be looked upon by the great nations of the earth?

Why, gentlemen, this Government ever since it has been established has been the great fortress and home of freedom upon the face of the globe. It has been the only great, well-organized, well-established Republic on the earth. Everywhere, in every country where men and women were hoping and struggling and praying for freedom, for better government, for equal laws, for independence from tyranny, they have looked to this great Republic as the mariner looks to the north star for guidance. This Republic has been their hope and their encouragement. And, sir, I believe that if this Republic in its struggle against the rebellion had been destroyed, the loss of our influence in the earth would been calamitous to mankind. If we had not maintained the integrity of the Union, France would not be a Republic to-day; Brazil would not have put off the panoply of monarchy and put on the habiliments of a democratic government; England and Germany and the other Governments of the Old World would not have been liberalized as much as they have been. The success and the benign influence of this great Republic gave an impetus to liberty and the equal rights of man such as they have received from no other great human achievement.

Now the question recurs, whether our influence shall continue in the same direction in which it has heretofore gone forth—whether we shall continue to be the beacon light for every people struggling for free government, for independence, for the liberty of the individual and the masses, or whether we shall take a backward course and throw the influence of this great nation in favor of oppression.

My colleague [Mr. BOUTELLE], from whom I dislike to differ, talked yesterday about the sentiment of the people of this country being stirred up by pictorial representations in the newspapers. Ah, I think if he could feel the pulsations of the great heart of the people of this country he would find that no pictorial illustrations are necessary to stir up a sentiment in favor of a people struggling for liberty. [Applause.] That sentiment is a living one with Americans, and needs only a just cause to kindle it. Our people have not forgotten the history of their own country. They have not forgotten the seven years of war for independence, when the patriots of the Revolution showed perhaps as much fortitude, as much courage, as much persistence, as much of a spirit of self-sacrifice, as much readiness to suffer uncomplainingly for the cause in which they were engaged, as any people on the face of the globe have done since the dawn of history. And I ask my friends on the other side, have these Cuban patriots shown any less a spirit of self-sacrifice, any less determination to achieve their independence than our forefathers did? Have they not done quite as well?

Why, sir, I was rather amused when my colleague said that 40,000 Cubans are now fighting in the ranks of the Spanish army in Cuba. The prime minister of Spain says that Spain has sent 125,000 soldiers there. There were about 21,000 on the island before, making 186,000 well-trained, well-organized, well-equipped Spanish soldiers upon the Island of Cuba, according to their reckoning. Yet this band of insurgents, as they are called, these scattered freebooters, who, as somebody—I do not remember who—said in this House, number only 16,000, have, in the face and against the resistance of those 186,000 of Spanish soldiery, marched over the Island of Cuba and to-day occupy and control and tax and administer justice in more than three-fourths of it.

Ah, gentlemen, either our friends are mistaken as to the number of men fighting upon the Spanish side in Cuba or else these Cuban patriots are showing a strategy, a courage, a skill in arms which the armies of Hannibal never showed upon the battlefields of Rome. I say that a people who can thus maintain their struggle so long against such an enemy, who can continue to extend their jurisdiction over that country, can continue to achieve victory after victory, can not only maintain themselves but drive so great an army as gentlemen say the Spanish have into the fortresses and the cities of Cuba, so that they hardly dare come out except once in a while to send a detachment to meet the Cuban patriots when they taunt and defy them close to the walls of their strongholds—a people who are doing this and are to-day in control of almost the whole of the Island of Cuba have earned their independence and are entitled to recognition as belligerents at the hands of this great, liberty-loving, democratic Republic. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I am entitled to more time from the predecessor of my friend from New York, and I prefer not to accept the curtailment that he has made on the time yielded me by his predecessor. I hope he will see his way clear in allowing me to continue for the time to which I am entitled.

Mr. QUIGG. After so graceful a request, Mr. Speaker, I could not, of course, deny the gentleman.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I am always graceful to the gentleman who is so graceful himself. I can not help being graceful to my friend, and I thank him for his courtesy.

Now, our friends on the other side proclaim that they have an immense amount of sympathy for the insurgents in Cuba. Their hearts are on fire with love for them and their eyes are filled with tears on account of their sufferings, but they can not see their way to help them or to offer them any encouragement in their hours of trial and tribulation. They can not vote for the recognition of their belligerency. This is the kind of friendship which sounds well, but the fellow befriended does not care for it. Why can not they believe that the Cubans are entitled to recognition? Oh, because they say the Cubans have no government. Is that true? Of course they have not as stable a government as we have, but they have about as stable a government as our forefathers had when they had been fighting for eighteen months for their independence. Has Spain any right to complain of us if in the interest of humanity or of common justice we recognize the Cuban patriots to-day as entitled to belligerent rights?

Why, Mr. Speaker, if I recollect right, it was hardly forty days after the first gun was fired by the rebels upon Fort Sumter before they were recognized by Spain. Were they more entitled to recognition then than Cuba is to-day? It is true that they had a government. They had a form of government. They had a place for their capital, as indeed the Cubans have to-day; but had they made more progress, according to the numbers fighting, than the Cubans have made? Had they, in forty days after the first gun fired upon Sumter, invaded any part of our territory, driven us into our fortifications, captured any large body of Federal troops, or in any other manner established the fact that they were able to cope with the powers of the General Government? Why, I think not. Even the disaster of Bull Run, which was the first victory of any consequence achieved by the rebels and the first serious disaster to the Union arms, had not occurred when Spain recognized the belligerency of the Confederates. Indeed, there had then been no battle fought between the Confederates and ourselves, unless you call the bombardment of Fort Sumter a battle, when Spain recognized them. The rebels had merely declared their intention and were getting ready.

Now, after eighteen months, when the Cubans have taken control of three-fourths of the Island of Cuba, when the only places almost which they do not occupy are the fortified cities that the insurgents can not take because they have not artillery to batter down walls and fortifications, when they are not retreating but are advancing, daily, continually, tirelessly fighting and whipping the Spaniards, further and further gaining accretions to their forces, showing a skill in the movement of armed forces that perhaps has never been excelled, when we find that they are acting together with perfect harmony, with no breach in their ranks, no squabbles among their leaders, no division among them, but a uniform, steady purpose to achieve their independence, when we find them banded together by the strongest ties that can bind humanity, by all the ties of patriotism in the heart of each and every man, when we find them pushing forward for the one great object of their struggle, the independence of their country, I ask if, under these circumstances, if sustaining themselves as they have sustained themselves during all this time against the power of Spain, they are not quite as much entitled to recognition at our hands as the Confederates in our war for the suppression of the rebellion—in forty days after the first gun was fired and before the battle of Bull Run had been fought—were at the hands of Spain?

Why, my friends are talking as if war was right upon us if we give to the Cuban patriots this recognition. They seem to assume so much. Mr. Speaker, some of the statements that have been made here remind me of the story of the old maid, away up in the seventies, who was standing before a burning furnace, and the poor old woman began to cry, when someone standing near her asked what was the matter, why she was crying? "Why," she said, "I was just thinking that if I should ever get married, and should have a child and it should fall into the furnace, what a fearful thing it would be!" [Laughter and applause.] And so our friends on the other side are asserting here what a fearful thing it would be if we should have war with Spain on account of recognizing as belligerents the Cuban patriots a year and a half after they have begun the struggle and have been making their marvelously successful fight for independence, when we know that Spain recognized the Confederacy so soon after the beginning of hostilities; and yet, notwithstanding that action, no threat of war was ever made in this whole broad land on account of that action of the Spanish Government. [Applause.] And be it remembered, too, that Spain recognized the Southern rebels when the stake was not the retention of an island 3,000 miles away, but the life of our Government, the existence of our National Union. Indeed, had the rebels a better cause to fight for thirty-five years ago than the Cuban patriots have now? They were contending to destroy the grandest, justest, and most beneficent Government ever instituted among men. The Cuban patriots are fighting to overthrow a despotism which has robbed them of their substance, dwarfed the development of their resources, hindered progress, repressed improvements, ground them with taxation too burdensome to bear, violated all promises, and practiced the brutalities of the Middle Ages.

Gentlemen on the other side say, Who knows all these things? Why, they are as notorious as is the existence of Cuba itself, and the best evidence of any fact, next to an ocular demonstration, is its universal and indisputable notoriety.

Spain, by her cruelties and barbarities in Cuba, has richly earned the title of the Turkey of America. We have formally expressed our sympathy for the outraged Armenians, and have condemned the great Christian nations of Europe. We have called them selfish and cowardly because, controlled by their fear of each other and their own interests, they have raised no hand to arrest the butchery of Armenians by the thousands. And shall we have another Armenia, with all its inhuman cruelties, in this hemisphere, and close to our own doors, and hear the crying appeals of the oppressed, without so much as a formal protest, washing our hands, like Pontius Pilate, of responsibility? We can not escape responsibility by saying, like Cain, as do gentlemen upon the other side, "I am not my brother's keeper." [Applause.]

Thomas Jefferson said, "I tremble for my country when I remember that God is just." He referred to the responsibility of his countrymen for maintaining human slavery. His solicitude was well founded. Four years of civil war, the death by slaughter and disease of 300,000 brave, devoted Americans, and the destruction of billions of dollars' worth of property were a part of the penalty which we have paid for that national crime.

I believe in God's justice. I believe that Europe will pay dearly for her cold indifference to the bloody butchery of the Armenians. And if we shall show equal indifference to the barbarities committed upon the Cuban patriots, struggling as our forefathers struggled for liberty and independence, if we shall give them no friendly recognition, but by defeating these resolutions send word to them, to Spain, and to the world that great, free, republican America casts her weight into the scale of the oppressor, then I believe we shall have another crime to answer for, the penalty of which we can not measure and can not escape. [Great applause.]

Do we prize liberty only for ourselves? Shall men lose their souls when they aggregate into a nation?

Let us do right; right in the eyes of God and humanity; right in the eyes of men who have freedom and know what it costs, who can understand the longings and aspirations of patriotic hearts, and who believe that every oppressed people struggling for freedom is entitled to the sympathy and help, so far as it can be extended, of every nation that is free. In this direction lie safety and honor. In any other direction lie dishonor and danger.

Mr. QUIGG. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. AVERY].

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, I am not in a general way disposed to be belligerent. I have seen something of war and do not care to see any more of it. It does not produce a pleasant sensation to stand up and be shot at. It has a peculiar effect upon the knees that renders a man a little unsteady in his gait and gives him an awkward appearance. I do not think anyone really enjoys such a position. But no man likes to be called a coward, and no nation can afford to acquire such a reputation. A man standing by to see a brute pound a helpless woman would be branded a coward. If he should witness a murder which he had power to prevent, and made no effort to prevent it, he would be regarded as a party to the crime.

The civilized world has stood aghast at the spectacle of the great powers of Europe eyeing each other while the Turks, in full view, have been butchering the helpless Christians of Armenia. These barbarities have even aroused the indignation and called forth a vigorous protest from our friends in Massachusetts and other New England States. Here upon our very shores lies the fairest island of the Atlantic Ocean. For three hundred years it has been under the iron heel of a cruel and merciless despot, whose only effort has been to extort the last farthing of revenue from its hapless people. This despot first enslaved and then, in less than one hundred years, exterminated the native population, and then he supplied their place with slaves stolen from Africa and overseers brought from Spain. And from that day until this the whole conduct of Spain toward this island has been "marked by every act which may define a tyrant."

No chapter in the history of the last three hundred years is so crowded with acts of oppression, cruelty, barbarities, and suffering and with such heroic efforts to throw off the oppressor as that which relates to the conduct of Spain toward her fairest colony. And now this long-suffering and heroic people are engaged in a life and death struggle for the God-given right to govern themselves—"a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only." These people, in sight of our shore, are engaged in actual war for liberty and the right of self-government. They stretch out their hands across the narrow waters which separate them from us and ask the poor boon of being recognized as belligerents. For one, I know that my constituents expect and desire me to vote to accord them all the rights of war which belong to a brave people engaged in actual war for liberty; and I would be glad indeed to vote to acknowledge them as a free and independent nation, and, if need be, to vote money to aid them in maintaining their independence. By her long course of tyranny over Cuba Spain has forfeited every right to its ownership; and the same law which would deprive a cruel parent of the control of his child should be invoked to deprive Spain of any further control over Cuba. I say this with a full appreciation of the effect words spoken in this Hall may have upon the relations of this Government with other nations.

Cuba lies at the entrance of the great gulf that washes our Southern shore. She commands the entrance to that gulf, to the mouth of the Mississippi River, and the Nicaragua Canal, whenever it is built. In the possession of a strong naval power she would be a constant menace to our commerce and a vantage ground from which to threaten our whole Atlantic Seaboard. Spain has a treasury as empty as our own and a credit not quite so good. She needs money. England has money to loan, and she is constantly on the lookout for good investments and for strategic positions. Where can she find a stronger naval position than the harbors of that island or better security for investments?

Possibly the shadow of the Monroe doctrine may deter her for a time, but let trouble arise between this Government and England and the harbor at Habana will be the point from which demonstrations will be made along our eastern and southern coast. Cuba belongs to this continent; she has a right to be free. Self-interest, self-defense, humanity, and duty alike demand that the United States should aid her to attain this right; and all liberty-loving people everywhere will rejoice to welcome free Cuba into the great family of Western Republics. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] that his time is exhausted.

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has courteously agreed to yield to me some time.

Mr. TUCKER. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. QUIGG. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes of that time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT].

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, in the short time allotted to me I shall not be able to go into the details of this question, but it seems to me that if talking and speech making would do the Cubans any good, they would have been relieved sometime ago.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the time for talking has ceased and the time for action has come. I for one stand here ready and willing to do anything that is honorable and upright in the way of action that will relieve these Cuban patriots from the distresses and burdens under which they are laboring. [Applause.] What are they fighting for? Are they fighting for the blood of their brethren? No! Are they fighting for conquest? No! They are fighting for a word. It is that word that led downtrodden Israel through the bowels of the Red Sea; it is that word that rendered Marathon and Salamis and Thermopylæ immortal ideas; it is that word which sanctified even the blood upon the blade of Brutus; it is but a word, and that word is "liberty." [Applause.] They should have it; and if they need anything at the hands of this great, grand nation, the greatest upon the face of the earth, we should not withhold it, but give it to them in sympathy and in help, not only in words but in deeds.

I, sir, shall not only vote for these resolutions, but I stand ready to go further and to vote for a joint resolution calling upon the President to take decisive action, and if necessary to go down there and see that they do have an independent government set up for themselves. [Applause.] While they are fighting for that word "liberty," that word which will go sounding down the ages until the Jordan be dried up at its fountain and the Ægean rolls no more upon its shores, why should we, this great and powerful nation, stand here fearing to help our little neighbor when we can do it? Talk about the power of the United States. A distinguished Fourth of July orator has said, and I believe it is almost the truth, that the great United States could whip the world; that she had on two occasions whipped Great Britain; that she had whipped Mexico several times; that every time she got at leisure she would go out and whip the Indians, and finally the top and bottom of the map fell out and she turned in and flogged herself, and that is what the last war meant. [Laughter.] Bounded as she is on the east by the turbulent Atlantic, on the west by the smooth Pacific, on the north by the Aurora Borealis, and on the south by the Day of Judgment, why can she not take care of that little baby down there, if necessary, and annex her and have her as her own, having her own sugar in her coffee and plenty of molasses to lick. [Laughter.]

Talk about the Cubans being guerrillas! Let me call your attention to those brave South Carolinians—Marion, the swamp fox, and Sumter, the gamecock. Did they have any particular place to fight? Did they go out and meet the enemy? No; they hung upon the flanks of the enemy and baffled them. They are the men who repulsed the bloody Tarleton at Kings Mountain, when the spirit of freedom and independence was slowly ebbing. They turned the tide and gave us this great, grand, glorious Government of ours—the land of the free and the home of the brave—where every man can worship under his own vine and fig tree, or not worship at all, if he likes.

Then let us recognize that these Cuban patriots are striving for freedom, are striving for liberty, and let them have that help which they need at the hands of this nation. The spirit which imbues them, the spirit which pushes them on, is that same spirit of freedom which actuated our forefathers when the flag of revolt was flying to the breeze against the black-hearted despotism of Great Britain when our independence was achieved. Let us do all that we can to help the Cubans, who are struggling in that same spirit, for independence, liberty, and freedom. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIGG. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KIEFER].

Mr. KIEFER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, nearly six weeks have elapsed since these resolutions, having reference to the situation in Cuba, were reported to the House by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. We had been impatient, and I believe the country had been impatient for a long time prior to the 27th day of February, when the report was finally brought in by the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. HITT of Illinois. I had filed many petitions from my people, and I know of my own personal knowledge that the heart of every true lover of liberty within the confines of the Fourth Congressional district of Minnesota is in sympathy with those struggling patriots in Cuba, who have for years been denied the privilege of self-government. And I doubt not that my district is but a fair indication of the sentiments and the sympathies of the people of this country from one end to the other. We have received no protests against the passage of these resolutions. And so great was the pressure of public opinion in favor of the recognition of the belligerency of the Cubans when the resolutions were first reported that the upper branch of the Congress—the Senate, which generally moves with such deliberation as to cause the wish to be often expressed in the public prints and elsewhere that that body might reform itself—the Senate of the United States in this instance actually discounted our efforts, and before we could call the previous question on the resolutions the other branch of Congress sent to our doors a set of resolutions declaring that a state of public war existed in the Island of Cuba, and that the struggling people in that benighted land should be duly accorded the rights to which every nation is entitled in the event of hostilities with another nation.

This House saw fit to amend the Senate resolutions in a few minor details. The main and central idea was not changed in the least. By an overwhelming vote we passed them and sent them back to the Senate with slight amendments. But, alas, where was the spirit of liberty and the genius of representative government which had marked the brief but eloquent and soul-stirring debate only a few days previous? Liberty seems to have fled from the Senatorial semicircle and an evil genius crept in, and, like the serpent at the ear of Mother Eve, whispered "delay." And then light gave way to darkness, patriotism to distrust and doubt, and the Senate abjectly capitulated and refused to maintain its former position or stand by its first declarations. I know not why this was done. I do know that it presents an absurd position to the country. For months we have ample evidence that a state of war existed in Cuba. The army of invasion has been pouring in. Spanish men-of-war have been unloading munitions and provisions to lay siege to the citadels of the Cubans. Why delay action a moment longer? Both House and Senate have once said that we should declare the belligerency of the insurgents. There need be no fear of war with Spain. That effete and crumbling monarchy, which for ages suppressed the freedom of the individual, is now making its last rally to perpetuate primogeniture on the Western Continent. I venture the assertion that if we declare in favor of the Cubans other nations will soon follow, and there will be a new republic established within the next year. So I say, let us pass the Senate resolutions, and thus prevent any more delay. Liberty is the watchword of the American people. Do not let us hesitate to declare for the same rights for others which we ourselves enjoy and which cost so much to secure during the first hundred years of this great Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIGG. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to express my sympathy on the side of the Cuban people, and to say that I am for these resolutions. Gentlemen say there is some risk in taking this step. I think that, as far as that is concerned, the risk is small; but, Mr. Speaker, there comes a time to nations as well as to men when to achieve the right, when to stand for principle, when to work out the best results; nations as well as men must take a stand on the side of humanity and progress.

Only a few weeks since, when that ringing message came from the President in regard to upholding the Monroe doctrine on this continent, we heard the same prediction, that war was inevitable. But this House stood by the other House and by the President—stood for the right, stood for the voice of this people as a nation—and the clouds of war have disappeared, and the decision of this people is practically unanimous that Congress was right in the position taken.

The darkest blot, Mr. Speaker, upon the national history in recent years was the refusal of sympathy with the Hawaiian Government in the time of her trouble; and the nation will never be satisfied in regard to that struggling Republic until we have had an opportunity to evince the sentiment which this people have always entertained, and which was misrepresented when the representatives of our Government hauled down the flag upon that island. When freedom, from her mountain height, gave that old standard to this people she required of them that they should keep this old banner in the sky, not only as the emblem of the freedom of her own people, but for liberty struggling people everywhere; that men striving for liberty, men battling for freedom, should behold its folds, be encouraged, and thus be aided in achieving victory.

Struggling Republics always look to this Government. And why? Simply because we are recognized as the greatest Republic on earth; and when gentlemen say we are to take a risk, I would ask them if it is not worth while, when we consider that notwithstanding what it has cost this nation in treasure and lives to uphold a republican form of government, that our liberties maintained and blessings enjoyed compensate for the great cost, is it not worth our while to take such a risk, as we shall in this case, to seek to encourage a people who are striving for liberty and who seek our sympathy in establishing a like form of government, and who are in the same position that we know our fathers were at the institution of this Republic?

There are times, Mr. Speaker, when patriotism can not be measured with dollars. There are times when commerce can not be set off against liberty; and I believe the time has come in this nation as regards the future of that island that for mere mercenary reasons we can not afford to longer remain silent; and the time has come now, in my opinion, when we should speak and when we should speak unanimously. I believe that the people of this nation, Mr. Speaker, after more than a year's reflection, have come to the conclusion not only in the mountains of New England and in the valleys of the West, but on the great prairies beyond, that Congress should act in this matter. I know, Mr. Speaker, that in my own State, where brave pioneers are building homes, sympathy for the struggling people of Hawaii and Cuba, the desire for the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine and a vigorous American policy abounds; and they are willing to assume the responsibility of an affirmative declaration on the resolutions before this House. The people, after mature reflection, have come to the conclusion that it is our duty as a people loving liberty, disregarding the technical and refined constructions, if need be, of international law, it is our duty as a people honoring our fathers, who fought for freedom, to recognize this people; and, Mr. Speaker, I believe that in this case the voice of the people is the voice of God; and that it is our duty to carry out the wishes of the people of this great Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, on a former occasion I gave to the House my views on these resolutions, and as the House has doubtlessly cherished those views very sacredly, I shall not inflict myself upon it to-night but for a moment. But in closing this debate, sir, I want to call the attention of gentlemen to the cardinal principle involved in these resolutions. We are inaugurating in this second resolution a departure from the precedents of this Government, which, if followed, will return to plague the inventor. It is a disposition of interference in the domestic policy of other nations with whom we are on friendly terms that may be brooked by Spain, but the time will come when, if persisted in, we will meet a foeman worthy of our steel.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the resolutions because they are not right. Sympathy for freedom, for liberty, is cheap and beautiful; but I say to my honorable friend from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN], who always appeals to the warmest sympathies of my heart, that I carry in my heart greater sympathy for 70,000,000 Americans than for a million and a half Cubans. What will it profit this Government if you free Cuba but enslave your own people?

Mr. MAHON. It is not our purpose to do that.

Mr. PICKLER. There is no danger of that.

Mr. TUCKER. Ah! no danger of that. What business have you to interfere with the domestic policy of a foreign country, invite war, and increase the debt of the country?

Mr. MAHON. What business had she to interfere with us?

Mr. TUCKER. When did she interfere?

Mr. MAHON. In 1861. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TUCKER. Why, she did exactly right.

Mr. MAHON. Then we are doing right now. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. TUCKER. Let me say to the gentleman that he is speaking of the first resolution; I am speaking to the second. The first resolution is abstractly right, as the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] has shown us to-night; but, Mr. Speaker, the first resolution refers merely to belligerency. What right has this House to declare belligerency. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts who spoke this evening amply developed that subject, showing that the recognition of belligerency is an executive function, and not a legislative one. And but a few weeks ago we heard gentlemen on this floor criticising the Secretary of Agriculture and Mr. Bowler, the Comptroller of the Treasury. Why? Because they had attempted, as parts of the executive of the Government, not to execute its laws, but to make them, as was claimed. Now, what are you doing? With your powers as a legislative body you are simply returning the compliment and attempting to interfere with an executive function. Take the beam out of thine own eye.

Mr. TRACEY. We are trying to hold up his hands.

Mr. TUCKER. Whose hands?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia what section of the Constitution or what law of the United States vests the power to confer belligerency in the Executive of this nation?

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, if I had the time, which I have not to-night, I could convince even my unwilling friend from Michigan of the correctness of that proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can you name a section of the Constitution or a law of the United States which vests that power in the Executive?

Mr. TUCKER. I have authorities here by the cart load—more than my friend could carry home with him.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If you do not name such a section of the Constitution or such a law, I shall deny that it exists and defy you to name a constitutional provision or a statute that confers that power.

Mr. TUCKER. Well, I shall have to take my friend's defiance for the present. All I mean is this, and my friend himself must recognize it, that whether it is in the Constitution in words or not the right to accord belligerency is an Executive function.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not recognize it.

Mr. TUCKER. Then my friend is in a large minority.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I say to my friend from Virginia that Henry Clay, a distinguished Representative coming from the South, as the gentleman himself does, said in the House of Representatives that when the Executive fails to do his duty, it is the duty of the Legislature to prod him to it and to force him to it. [Applause.]

Mr. TUCKER. And I suppose the gentleman, knowing the weak character that is now sitting in the White House [laughter], is attempting by these resolutions to force him to do his duty. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We want to call the roll on him.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois took that view of this matter, that we, as a legislative body, are kindly giving advice to the Executive as to what he ought to do. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take up further time, because I have promised to yield what remains to me to my friend from New York. I hope these resolutions will be defeated for the benefit of Spain, for the benefit of Cuba, but more than all, and above all, for the benefit of the free American people of this country. I hope they will be defeated, because it is the beginning of a policy that means the destruction of our old-time American policy. Unless the United States proposes to become the guardian for all of the weak, puling countries in the South American continent we must not vote for these resolutions.

I now yield the balance of my time to my friend from New York, Mr. QUIGG.

Mr. PICKLER. Before the gentleman sits down, I would like to ask him if he does not think that Cuba is alarmingly near the United States for Spain to be upholding such a government there? Is not Spain a long way from home to maintain a government of that kind?

Mr. TUCKER. Not farther from home than my friend is on this question. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, by the law of nations the discovery of new lands, followed by actual possession, invests the discoverer with good title. Spain having discovered and colonized Cuba, she is entitled to the possession of the island against all the world, except it be the Cubans. The claim that the Cubans assert to the country and the right to an independent government rests upon a different principle.

An island or province situated remotely from the parent government and held after the province has sufficient population, intelligence, and resources to maintain a government and desires its establishment is, as a rule, held for revenue only. History abundantly proves that remote possessions have usually been by the parent government negligently or criminally governed. In the very nature of things they could not be fostered and protected as are the people of the home government. The government for Cuba has been no exception to this rule. She has been denied equal representation in the Spanish Cortes, and there has been scarcely any limit to the taxes imposed on the people. Every species of taxation which the ingenuity of man has been able to devise since the beginning of civil government has been imposed in Cuba. These burdens have been laid on both their imports and exports, on every sort of occupation, and in addition to these a per capita tax has been imposed.

Cuba has much more to complain of against Spain because of unjust and burdensome taxation than the American colonies had when they so heroically resisted the stamp act and the Parliamentary tax upon tea.

The title of Spain, derived through discovery and colonization, does not carry with it the right to oppress. There is no such natural or acquired right as this. Governments are no longer maintained for the benefit of kings and princes, though some, I confess, are a little slow in learning this great truth.

Spain's relation to Cuba, from equitable considerations, is somewhat analogous to that of guardian and ward. Having planted her colonies on the island it was her duty to promote their welfare until the colonies had reached their majority; that is, until they were able and desirous of maintaining a government for themselves. Spain can have no title to the inhabitants—to human beings—and the Cubans have, through taxation, paid the Spanish Government for the island more than a hundredfold. In equity she would not be bound to pay for the lands after the long and continuous occupancy, but the fact that she has paid the full value many times over ought to strengthen the claim of her people.

Cuba is now past her majority and asserts her right to freedom. She bases her claim upon her long occupancy, upon the broken promises, mismanagement, and oppressions of the parent Government, and upon the further assertion that she is amply able to establish and maintain a form of government better suited to the wants and conditions of her people.

I take it that any people situated as the Cubans are with reference to Spain, when they are prepared for self-government, even if there were no systematic oppression, would have a good claim to independence, and would be entitled to fair consideration from other nations. Separated by the ocean, and thousands of miles from the home Government, Cuba would almost of necessity be neglected. Add to this neglect the broken promises of 1878, long continued abuses, and misgovernment, and her cause most forcibly appeals to everyone who believes in fair dealing and good government. I take it that it will not be denied that the right of revolution to establish independence is inherent in every people which are so widely separated by the seas from the parent Government as is Cuba.

But the serious question and the one about which there are some differences of opinion is, What are we going to do about it? Our Government is republican in form. All our institutions are founded and conducted upon the idea that the people rule. It is therefore natural that our people should sympathize with those of every land who are contending for better conditions and for larger liberties.

I understand that there is a treaty with Spain which prohibits in this country the organization of military companies for the purpose of aiding revolt in any of the Spanish possessions, but this treaty in no sense precludes our Government from recognizing the fact that a state of hostilities exists in Cuba.

By the Chinese restriction act, passed a few years ago, Congress annulled a stipulation in the treaty with China regarding immigration to this couutry, and the Federal Supreme Court sustained this act. Hence the law is well settled that Congress has power to annul or modify an international treaty. I am willing to concede that such legislation is not defensible, except in extraordinary cases, but every nation has the undoubted right to self-preservation so long as it is endeavoring to uphold and perpetuate good government. But where a province adjacent to the United States is striving to throw off the yoke of oppression and establish a republican form of government this Government has the right, and it is its duty, to see that fair treatment is accorded to such province. And I say in all candor that I believe the time is at hand when the Chief Executive of the United States should accord to the Cubans full belligerent rights. I know this is an important step, and should always be taken with due sense of the responsibility, but when questions of humanity and free government are involved this, the greatest of Republics, should not hesitate to assert its judgment. When emergencies present themselves responsibilities must be taken. Mr. Lincoln drove the French invaders from Mexico near the close of our great civil war. It required courage, under the circumstances, but Mr. Lincoln was equal to the occasion, and he was sustained by his countrymen.

Mr. Speaker, I am not unmindful of the fact that by international law there are certain tests to be applied by a foreign government in determining when belligerency should be extended to a revolting state. I understand the chief test is whether a state of actual war, as distinguished from a mere insurrection, exists. Another test requires that the revolting state must have made some effort to set up a government, for there should be some tangible organized civil authority or some government in process of formation to supersede the former government, if the revolution should succeed. In the case of Cuba, there can be no question but there exists to-day a military conflict within its borders. Civil government is suspended, or set at naught, except in a few places. The Spanish authorities are, and have been for many months, treating the military operations of Cuba as a forcible revolt against the parental sway. These evidences, coming to us in the most authentic manner, settle the question that Cuba is prosecuting a contest by military force for independence, and that Spain is resisting such contest with all the military force at her command. Every gentleman on this floor must be satisfied that there is public war in Cuba. It is waged by the Cubans on the same principle that our patriot fathers made war against British authority in 1776. It can not be expected, nor has it ever been required, that there should be a fully equipped civil government in operation before belligerency should be accorded. It is sufficient if there is an honest effort being made to organize a new government. The Cubans are making this effort. The evidence on this point is conclusive.

In considering the war between Spain and her colonies in 1825, Mr. Clay, then Secretary of State, said:

> No statesman can have contemplated the colonial relations of Europe and continental America without foreseeing that the time must come when they would cease. That time might have been retarded or accelerated, but come it must, in the great march of human events.

The former relations between Spain and most of her American colonies did cease about that time, but Cuba still remained under parental control. From 1868 to 1878 she made a heroic contest for freedom, but was finally reconciled by promised reformation. These promises have been broken, or at least have not been kept in good faith, and Cuba has again asserted her right to a separation. She has caught the spirit of the age, and is going to be free. Her cause can hardly be retarded much longer.

It has been said that Cubans are not prepared for self-government. This charge was made against the American colonies. It has been made against every people who were struggling to free themselves from the oppressions of old governments. New responsibilities develop latent powers. Experience has demonstrated that self-government produces independent thought and the ability to meet additional obligations. I am convinced that when Cuba becomes free she will be able to establish and maintain a far better government than Spain has ever given her. Believing this, I shall heartily support these resolutions.

The tendency of the times for nations, as well as for individuals, is toward greater freedom. All peoples are seeking better conditions. This onward march can not be checked. Napoleon once declared that "the highest quality of a great general is the ability to see things as they are, and not to make pictures in his own mind." We see to-day this battle being waged everywhere. As Americans, we ought to send greetings to every people who are engaged in this struggle. Every member who has spoken upon these resolutions has asserted his sympathy with Cubans. Declarations upon the floor will give little relief, but we can give substantial aid and sympathy by adopting these resolutions, and I trust it will be done by an unmistakable majority. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 10 o'clock having arrived, the Chair, in accordance with the previous order, declares the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, Mr. LACEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred House bill No. 7718, reported in lieu thereof a bill (H. R. 7945)) to provide for the entry of lands in Greer County, Okla., to give preference rights to settlers, and for other purposes, accompanied by a report (No. 1113); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. HANLY, from the Committee on Claims:

The bill (H. R. 574) for the relief of Maj. Charles A. Woodruff. (Report No. 1114.)

The bill (H. R. 1625) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to determine and pay certain claims against the Fond du Lac Indians. (Report No. 1115.)

The bill (H. R. 5701) for the relief of Julius Stahel. (Report No. 1116.)

The bill (H. R. 953) for the relief of William Gray. (Report No. 1120.)

By Mr. BAKER of Kansas, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 4281) granting a pension to George Johnson, of Lenox, Iowa. (Report No. 1123.)

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GROSVENOR: A bill (H. R. 7946) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy of the United States—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. PAYNE: A bill (H. R. 7947) to amend section 2502 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KIEFER: A bill (H. R. 7948) authorizing the Secretary of War to recognize the organizations of the Sons of Veterans as part of the military reserve of the United States—to the Committee on the Militia.

By Mr. FISCHER: A concurrent resolution (House Con. Res. No. 39) concerning the distribution of seed—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. PICKLER: A resolution (House Res. No. 235) to fix time for consideration of H. R. 5549—to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills of the following titles were presented and referred as follows:

By Mr. DOLLIVER: A bill (H. R. 7949) to increase the pension of Margaret E. Pierce—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DOVENER: A bill (H. R. 7950) granting a pension to Mary E. Radcliffe, of Wheeling, Ohio County, W. Va.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FARIS: A bill (H. R. 7951) to pension Rhoda L. Day and Jettie Annis—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HAGER: A bill (H. R. 7952) granting a pension to Mary J. Shaw—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HANLY: A bill (H. R. 7953) to increase the pension of Philip Caslow—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HOOKER: A bill (H. R. 7954) to pension James H. Rathburn, father of Charles B. Rathburn—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HOWE: A bill (H. R. 7955) to remove the charge of desertion from the naval record of William Kiernes—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HULICK: A bill (H. R. 7956) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John S. Cadamy—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7957) to remove charge of desertion from military record of Thomas Reveal—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HULL: A bill (H. R. 7958) for the relief of Edmund E. Schreiner—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MILLIKEN: A bill (H. R. 7959) granting an increase of pension to Robert W. Groves—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 1st instant approved and signed the following joint resolutions:

A joint resolution (S. R. 111) to authorize Benjamin Harrison to accept certain medals presented to him while President of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 114) authorizing and directing Bernard R. Green to exercise the duties and powers heretofore conferred upon the late Gen. Thomas L. Casey, in relation to the construction of the Library of Congress.

THE REVENUE BILL AND SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. MANTLE. I give notice that upon next Thursday, at the conclusion of the morning business, I shall call up the resolution submitted by my colleague [Mr. CARTER] February 19, 1896, proposing to recommit House bill 2749 to the Committee on Finance, and with the indulgence of the Senate I shall ask permission to submit a few remarks thereon.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6614, being the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT].

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. CALL. I propose to ask the Senator from Iowa if he has any objection to the consideration of the joint resolution in relation to Cuba, which I introduced on the last legislative day? The Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] is ready to submit some remarks upon it if there is no particular reason for urgency in regard to the appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall gladly yield to the Senator from Florida to take up any question that will not lead to debate, but certainly no more important question can now be brought before us than the consideration of the appropriation bills. I much regret to decline to yield, but I must do so, as I presume the joint resolution will lead to more or less debate.

Mr. CALL. I give notice, then, that I shall ask to-morrow morning, after the conclusion of the routine business, to take up for consideration the joint resolution relating to Cuba that I introduced on the last legislative day.

Mr. HALE. What is the condition of the resolution offered by the Senator from Florida? I supposed it had gone to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is a joint resolution, and it has gone to the table.

Mr. HALE. Under the rule a resolution going over goes to the Calendar on the second day.

Mr. CALL. I asked that it should be laid upon the table in order that it might be taken up at any time the Senate is willing that it shall be considered. I shall ask to-morrow morning, after the morning business, that it may be taken up at least for some observations to be made by the Senator from Indiana and perhaps by myself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In response to the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Maine, the Chair will state that the resolution introduced by the Senator from Florida is a joint resolution, and it has gone to the table. It can be taken up by motion.

Mr. HALE. I so understand. It can only be taken up by motion.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

Mr. ALLISON. I believe the pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], and that he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand that the amendment now in order is the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and reported by me from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. ALLISON. I may be mistaken, but I understood the Senator from Florida at the last day's session to offer an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. PASCO. It was in connection with the same subject matter, but I decided, for the time being at all events, not to offer it as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. So I understood.

Mr. PASCO. I will let it stand on its own merits for the present.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I find it necessary to ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments more in reference to the amendment which was offered originally by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and which was afterwards reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and referred upon the recommendation of that committee to the Committee on Appropriations, and which, unfortunately, from the point of view I take, was not reported from that committee.

I find that we were all of us in some error on Thursday last as to the phraseology of the amendment, and if I shall not only ask to correct it, but also ask to add to the amendment, and if these constant amendments seem rather of a blundering character, the Senate will understand that when the pending appropriation bill was brought in for consideration it was the first time that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads or any member of it had seen it. There is perhaps no reason why we should have seen it; and yet if an opportunity had been tendered to the committee or its members to have seen something of the provisions to be inserted, if we could have been advised somewhat as to the character of the amendments recommended by the committee or which were to be rejected, it is possible we might have saved a little of the time of the Senate, although I do not know that we could have hoped to have illumined the intelligence of the Committee on Appropriations.

Upon Thursday we unanimously excluded the use of the word "superintendents" upon the suggestion of the chairman of the committee that there were no such persons as superintendents in the postal service. I find that under the provisions of law there are superintendents who are very much alive and very much needed in the postal service. These superintendents fill a recognized function, and the presence of the word "superintendent" is absolutely essential in the amendment and should not have been stricken from it. I refer the chairman of the committee to section 451 of the postal laws, at the top of page 200:

> Superintendents of stations, 10 classes, salary graded in even hundreds of dollars, from $1,000 to not exceeding $2,000 per annum, except at New York, N. Y., where the salaries of the superintendents of stations "A" and "D" shall be fixed at $2,500 each per annum, and superintendents of stations "E" and "F" shall be fixed at $2,200 each per annum.

These superintendents take the place wherever a second-class post-office is consolidated with the other post-offices under the classification of clerk hire. The clerk in charge of these stations is known as a superintendent of the office, and therefore this word should have been retained in the amendment.

There are in the postal service the post-office, the station, the substation, and the stamp agency. To the public at large it is a post-office, but these distinctions are the distinctions recognized by the Department. The post-office has its boxes, its money orders, its registry division, its stamps, its carriers, and its clerks, if it is a free-delivery office. The person in charge when it becomes a station is a superintendent, and his salary is fixed at from $1,000 to $2,000. The substation under the consolidation plan of the Department ordinarily has no boxes, although it sometimes has. It does not have free delivery—that is, the free delivery in the community, if it is a substation, comes from the main office. It does have the sale of stamps; it has registry; it has money orders. These clerks are compensated under the provisions of section 451 and paid from $100 to $1,000. A substation is usually located in a community where there is free delivery, but the free delivery is not from the substation itself—that is, the carriers do not start on their rounds from the substations—but the public is equally served from the substations. Stamp agencies are common in all cities of the country, and the compensation of a stamp agent is $24 a year. There is no clerk hire in third and fourth class post-offices, and whenever clerk hire is to be awarded, as it often must, it comes under the provisions of law which provide for compensation where there are separating offices; for instance, at the terminus of a railroad there will be mail distributed for a half dozen stage routes, and there there may be clerk hire needed.

Then, under the clause of the appropriation bill which applies money is allowed the third and fourth class offices for separating offices. So the offices are gathered together for the efficiency of the service. For instance, there is the main office in the city of Chicago. There are 26 stations; there are 69 substations; there are 190 stamp agencies. And to secure this result there were 59 post-offices consolidated inside the city of New York and its suburbs and brought under one management, and some of those offices are 15 miles from the city. They have not lost their separate names to the public at large; they are still separate post-offices, but as a matter of fact they come under one compact, simple business management, where there is upon the ground and in the immediate vicinity a supervising head, who inspects the offices regularly and looks after the management of their affairs, and sees that they are conducted upon business principles, and instructs new postmasters in their duties.

Mr. President, do you know that we are now making fourth-class post-offices, and have done so for the last ten years, at the average rate of 2,013 a year? At 50,000 of the fourth-class post-offices of the United States the postmaster has an annual compensation of less than $50. It is utterly impossible under present appropriations to make any sort of investigation and inspection of all these offices. I am told that there are offices where for fifteen years no inspector has been able to go, because there are too few inspectors. They are called upon to report as to the changing of routes, as to the construction of new buildings, and as to a thousand other things; indeed, when there is a specific case of robbery; but as to the general inspection of this great army of 70,000 postmasters it is utterly impossible that from this main office, where there is no intermediate authority to supervise and to inspect and to govern, there should be any sort of efficient management of those offices.

Meanwhile from the central office at Washington there are 70,000 separate accounts to be kept, increasing, as I have said, at the rate of something like 2,000 a year; and it goes not only to the supply of stamps and stamped envelopes, but if there is twine needed, or wrapping paper, or canceling stamps, or the thousand and one little items that go to make up the small business of a postmaster in a little town, he is compelled to send his requisition here to the Post-Office Department, which has to open a separate account with him, sometimes four or five thousand miles away, with the same particularity and the same precision and the same separateness with which it would be compelled to deal with the postmaster at San Francisco, Cal. All this is to be averted and avoided by putting in central communities an inspection power, a supervisory power, which is to reach out and take in these postmasters.

There are no politics about it. Politics cut not the least figure in it in the world; it is efficiency of management. Of all business in the world which the Government conducts, there is none which should be so free from political taint as the post-office. It is essentially a great, huge business. The man who has to receive our letters and transmit them for delivery ought not to be a man whose employment and detention in office depend upon whom he voted for for President of the United States and as to whom he will vote for next. It ought to be based upon his integrity, his ability, his intelligence, and upon nothing else. Just so long as we base these employments upon political service alone, just so long will there be constant deficits in the Post-Office revenues as against its expenditures, and just so long will the people be prevented from having that low rate of letter postage which is the goal to which we all look forward, which is the reform which every Postmaster-General hopes to see some day attained.

Mr. President, the Senate is composed of men of consummate wisdom, but it seems that the assembled wisdom of the Senate on Thursday last was not sufficient to embrace the subject of the civil service, and so far as I know no one of us knew what the provision of the civil-service law was. At least, no one was able to enlighten us, and the consequence was that we all talked a great deal more learnedly than we would probably have done if we had known anything about it. We had a great deal of pathos wasted here about the old postmasters at the country stores, who had served for years, reading everybody's postal cards, and, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] suggested, finding somebody going down Oak lane and getting him to carry a religious newspaper to his neighbor, and he feared these men were to be turned adrift upon a cold and unfeeling world and their place supplied by somebody who knew something.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the provisions of the civil-service law adopted in 1893 provided for the general classification of these clerks. As post-offices were extended, widened out, more offices embraced, then the clerks of the classified service were to be embraced in the office. But as late as November 12, 1895, the Civil Service Commission promulgated a proclamation by the President of the United States which entirely protected the people now employed in office by amending as follows:

And whenever, by order of the Postmaster-General, any post-office shall be consolidated with, and made a part of, another post-office where free delivery is established, all the employees of the office thus consolidated, whose names appear on the roster of said office approved by the Post-Office Department, and including the postmaster thereof, shall, from the date of said order, be employees of said free-delivery office, and the person holding on the date of said order the position of postmaster at the office thus consolidated with said free-delivery office may be assigned to any position therein and given any appropriate designation under the classification act which the Postmaster-General may direct.

Clerks were provided for in 1893. In 1895 it was expressly provided by law that when an office is consolidated the postmaster in charge shall be covered into the civil service as a clerk and shall continue to be employed. So far as the post-offices are concerned in the little stores, they will continue to be kept in the same little places. The local habitation of the post-office is not changed, but instead of its being swapped around whenever there is a change of Administration so that the Democratic grocery store keeper gets it one Administration and the Republican grocery store keeper gets it the next Administration, instead of being run as a sort of political machine, irrespective of the integrity or the ability or the training of the person who has charge of the letters, at some proper place within each village the little post-office is established. The clerk put there is under the immediate supervisory power of some postmaster near by who can keep him inspected and see that he does his duty, and see that he does not keep letters a month until he finds somebody going down Oak Lane to deliver them, and see that the office is managed so that the public gets the benefit of it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? A clerk goes from Baltimore to Laurel to take charge of the post-office there, and the old postmaster is dismissed. Who is going to keep the office? The clerk is not supposed to be a resident of the place.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The old postmaster is not dismissed. If the Senator from Connecticut had done me the honor to listen to this proclamation of the President he would see that the postmaster is not dismissed by the fellow who goes down from Baltimore to Laurel.

Mr. HAWLEY. But what is the fellow who goes down going to do when he gets there? Your civil-service clerk is sent down from Baltimore. He can not run the post-office.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand that the old postmaster is retained.

Mr. HAWLEY. But what is the new man going to do when he gets there?

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the old postmaster is retained there is no need of a new man.

Mr. HAWLEY. But how do you know that the old postmaster wants to be a clerk?

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the old postmaster resigns and gets out of the office then the new man goes there. He goes around to two or three stores in the village and they are all tickled to death to get the post-office, because it brings trade. He looks around and finds that here is the cleanest and best place, with the least suspicion of rumselling about it, a place where little children and ladies would go to get their mail, and he rents that for an office. He makes an arrangement a great deal better for the Government and a great deal better for the persons who get their mail than the old arrangement which gave the office as a reward for party service.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then you would have two postmasters there?

Mr. WOLCOTT. You would not have two postmasters. If the old postmaster should resign he would probably go out West and grow up with the country.

Mr. HAWLEY. And the new man has to go around and beg for a place in which to hold the post-office.

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; the Government pays the rent. He has not to beg for anything. The statistics of the consolidated offices show that they have a great deal better service, and that it costs much less money than by the old system.

Mr. HAWLEY. It shows that to be the case in the big cities.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It shows it in the country towns, too. Now, I will come to what the Senator from Connecticut is objecting to. You would find sometimes in the limits of a city a whole lot of different postmasters. I will call the Senator's attention to some of these Oak Lane places. Here is the post-office at New Haven, Conn. Within the city limits of New Haven there is the post-office known as Westville, and the population served is about 2,000. Westville is distant from the city of New Haven about 3 miles, while just outside the city limits, and in some cases actually nearer the New Haven post-office, are the following independent post-offices:

West Haven, 2½ miles from New Haven post-office; salary of postmaster, $1,400. Population about 3,000.

East Haven, 5 miles from New Haven post-office; salary of postmaster, $342.

Montowese, 4½ miles from New Haven post-office; salary of postmaster, $1,100. Population about 2,000.

Whitneyville, 5 miles from New Haven post-office; salary of postmaster, $1,000. Population about 2,000.

Highwood, 2½ miles from New Haven post-office; salary of postmaster, $327.

The total salary and allowances of the six independent offices named above is $5,530. Stations and substations in lieu of these offices could probably be maintained for less than $5,000 and far better service given.

Now, I will ask the Senator from Connecticut if he thinks there is a place where these country postmasters ought to be kept. Every one of these places is within 4 or 5 miles of New Haven, and I will show him in a moment where, within the limits of the cities of Connecticut, they have post-office after post-office.

Mr. HAWLEY. I thought the Senator asked me a question.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I did.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will say, then, while the Senator is looking at his papers, that I distinctly said last Thursday, when this matter was up, that this consolidation would work excellently well. For example, taking Boston, there is no reason why Brookline, Roxbury, Cambridge, etc., all within easy reach, should not be under one system. So with places in the immediate vicinity of Baltimore. Everybody knows that it is necessary in the city of of New York to have some substations, etc. What I am objecting to is the spreading of the system all over the land, so as to take in the country post-offices in the United States.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will show the Senator the reason for it in a minute—as soon as I look over the papers I have here. I understood the Senator to say that he favored civil service generally; that he was the father of the law; but that he did not believe in it in this case.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not believe in carrying it to an extreme.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator a question for information?

Mr. WOLCOTT. With pleasure.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator from Colorado to maintain that the Postmaster-General can not, under existing law, consolidate the post-offices in the country surrounding New Haven with the office in the city of New Haven?

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Postmaster-General can do so, but under the present law he can not do it efficiently.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I will ask another question. Having abolished the minor offices and made them a part of the New Haven post-office, is there not ample authority to provide the necessary clerk hire for the substations without additional law?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; and it is to that I will address myself in a moment.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be glad to hear the Senator on that point.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the Senator will bear with me until I show the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] how these towns are built up in New England, which seem as if they needed consolidation, I will come to the question he suggests.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The organization of cities in New England seems peculiar to that section of country in this, that within the limits of many cities we find several other cities or towns with separate post-offices. For instance, the city of Gloucester, Mass., has five post-offices within its limits, in addition to the main office at Gloucester. Annisquam, with a population of 900, which is distant from the main office at Gloucester 4½ miles; Bay View, with a population of 1,000, is 5 miles distant; Lanesville, with a population of 1,900, is 6 miles distant; West Gloucester, with a population of 400, is 4½ miles distant; and Magnolia, with a population of 1,500, is 4½ miles distant. These five offices are to be abolished and stations established at Annisquam, Bay View, and Lanesville, and substations established at Magnolia and West Gloucester, and four additional carriers added, three for Bay View and one for Annisquam.

Medford, Mass., has three within its limits besides the main office—West Medford, with a population of 2,811, which is 1½ miles distant from the main office; Wellington, with a population of 453, which is 1⅞ miles distant, and Tuft's College, five-sixths of a mile distant. These are to be abolished and substations established, with two additional carriers to deliver mails to the patrons.

Manchester, N. H., has three additional post-offices within the city limits—Massabesic, with a population of 300, which is 4½ miles distant from main office; Goffs Falls, with a population of 150, which is 4 miles distant, and Amoskeag, with a population of 2,000, which is 1¼ miles distant. These are to be abolished, and five substations to be established, as follows: At West Manchester, East Manchester, Amoskeag, Goffs Falls, and Massabesic, with one additional carrier for the main office.

Fitchburg, Mass., has two additional post-offices within its limits—West Fitchburg, with a population of 3,000, and South Fitchburg, with a population of 1,000, which are both made stations to Fitchburg.

This is true of most, if not all, of the New England States, and it is true also of many towns in Connecticut. I seem to have mislaid for a moment the memoranda referring to the Connecticut towns. The following statement shows some of the independent offices within city limits:

* New office.

Mr. President, the theory of this attempt of the Post-Office Department is to gather all these offices, as far as possible, under one management, and under the provisions of the civil-service law, as I have stated, every old postmaster is retained; but we must face the fact that as to the new postmasters, as to those who are to come after, they are to be clerks, pure and simple. We may amend, if we like, the civil-service law, whereby these clerks shall be appointed from the counties or from the towns in which vacancies occur if there are proper persons there who offer to be employed; otherwise they are to come from the State the residents in which furnish the material for their employment.

But, Mr. President, the carriage of letters is not a sentimental business. It is built up just like any other business. You put stamps on sale and give the people ample post-office accommodations, and they will buy stamps and write letters. The experience of the Department is that wherever the people are given special facilities for the exchange of ideas and of getting their periodicals the business comes, and the people write as they are encouraged to write.

What earthly difference does it make in these little towns in the country whether or not a man who lives there is postmaster, or whether or not some efficient clerk, whose business is solely that of looking after his duties as a post-office clerk, and is not that of a merchant seeking trade, who does not want to gather in the poor people who come after letters in order to sell them molasses or rum, but who wants to give them the benefit of delivering their letters promptly and receiving those written by them, and nothing else? In the great business of the Post-Office Department, which represents an expenditure of so many million dollars and the loss of so many million dollars, what is there incongruous with the system of our institutions if these people can be better employed, because they are intelligent and they give their whole time to the business of the post-office; and we say: "Mr. Postmaster-General, employ as many in that way as you want; you can not look personally after 70,000 people when they want a bundle of twine or a package of wrapping paper; take these people and put them under competent heads who can supervise them and manage all these small details." That is the theory.

Now, I am very proud to say that the Post-Office Department under this Administration is sought to be properly conducted, so far as I know, and it has been, so far as I have observed, since I have been in public life. I am not by any means friendly with this Administration or with the administration of the Post-Office Department; I have nothing to do with them, but I do know that the affairs of that office are ably and intelligently conducted, and that the object of this movement is to remove it from politics, and not make it more political. Those who want the loaves and fishes need not be afraid, for if they worked night and day they could not take in a thousand offices between now and the time when there will be a change of Administration. We are establishing 2,000 post-offices a year and more. There is nothing political in this provision. It simply means better and more efficient service.

I tell you I think this love and appreciation of civil service is an acquired taste, and I think when you once get it it never leaves you. [Laughter.] I think, further, that any man who can stay here in public life during four years of an unfriendly Administration in his own party and who finds whenever he goes to seek appointments to office, even when "Yes" is said to him, it is said in the most offensive fashion; and when he is in public life with an Administration opposed to him he sees appointed in the State, whose interest and welfare he has at heart, unworthy men who are not fit to hold office, men whom their own fellow-citizens would never elect to an office or put into a place of public confidence, discharging these important duties, unintelligent and unprincipled as many of them are, and even people who are receiving the reward for political dirty work done in some other States than the States in which they are appointed—I say he can not fail to appreciate from a selfish point of view some of the beauties of civil-service reform.

I should be very glad, for my part, if this business could be taken from us and from patronage and given where the public could get their letters more promptly, where they could have greater facilities for obtaining post-office accommodations, and where the business could be conducted more like a business and less like a political job.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has asked me about the authority of the Postmaster-General to make these changes. Without the amendment, as the matter stands now, the Postmaster-General may establish or close any post-office he desires. He has the general power given to him to establish post-offices and the power to close and do away with offices; but the appropriations which are given by the committee are for clerk hire for post-offices. Unless some provision of law is adopted, when he closes a post-office the Postmaster-General puts it under clerk hire employment. He has to take the money for the clerk out of the appropriation for clerk hire, and the money for the salary of the postmaster lapses. He has not the power to-day, and therefore we must have some amendment to the law which will permit him to use the money no longer needed as salary for the postmaster, where the office has been consolidated. If the amendment is made in the form I seek to make it, then he will have the necessary power to consolidate offices and to make all proper arrangements for carrying on the business. With that in view there is an amendment suggested by the chairman of the committee which permits us to put back the word "superintendent," so that it may stand as it was originally and cover the people who have been postmasters in second-class offices, and who become clerks under the title of "superintendents," which is their title at free delivery offices.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator they are not given that title by law. That is the title, as I understand, by the regulations of the Department, not by law.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think not.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator show me where they are called "superintendents" by law and where they are provided for by law?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am looking at section 451 of the Postal Laws and Regulations. I take it that that is a section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. ALLISON. That is not a section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have not the statutes before me.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that is only a section of the Postal Regulations. The reason I stated it was not necessary to insert "superintendents" was that I did not know of such a designation in the statutes. Of course, if there are superintendents of these offices, so designated by statute, that is a proper phraseology, but if they are not so designated, then we inject into the law an office which is not known to the law. I know there are superintendents of those stations; there are superintendents of mail delivery at local offices in cities where there are a number of railroad stations; but they are mere designations under the Postal Regulations; and the officials are paid either from the mail-messenger service or from the clerk-hire service. The only reason why I suggested that the word "superintendent" should be stricken out was because it is a word not known to the law in this connection. If the Senator can point me to a law that recognizes the superintendent locally in charge of mails I should be very glad to agree to restore the provision, but otherwise I should object to it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, it does seem to me, with all deference to the Senator from Iowa who is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that it is rather hypercritical, because that word "superintendent" is not in the Revised Statutes, but is in the regulations of the Department under which we are doing business, and under which the Senator's committee has year after year reported bills giving money to the Department, for the Senator to say that it is now injecting a new word into the law. Certainly the superintendent is included in the rules of the Department, and if the word "superintendent" is stricken out the Department will not have the ability to apply the appropriations to the persons who fill the position of superintendent of the mails.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to disturb the Senator's line of argument, but there are three designations of these officials in the appropriation bills as to the conduct of the Post-Office Department. One is the designation of postmasters, another is the designation of clerks in post-offices, and another is the mail-messenger service. Those are the three designations under which all the employees of the postal service are paid in the management of the post-offices.

The Senator said a moment ago—and I mention that in connection with what I am about to say—that the reason for this change was that if these post-offices are consolidated less money will be needed for the salaries of postmasters and more money will be needed for the salaries of clerks. The Committee on Appropriations made full provision for that. We have reduced or rather failed to appropriate to the extent of $750,000 for the salaries of postmasters below what the present estimate of those salaries is, but we have increased the appropriation for clerk hire $150,000, so as to cover the clerk hire of those consolidated offices, if they are consolidated, thus leaving absolutely free play to the Postmaster-General to do what we think he can now do under existing law.

I will say now to the Senator from Colorado, if it is his purpose, under the guise of an amendment in the nature of a proviso, to reorganize the postal service of the United States and consolidate counties into a single post-office, it will be better for the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of this body to deal with the subject in a separate bill and not upon an appropriation bill, so that such safeguards may be thrown around it as will protect the revenue as well as protect those who are patrons of those post-offices. That is my objection to putting it in in this way as a new relation and as a new condition respecting all the post-offices in the United States. I did not so understand it on Thursday last, and I do not so understand it now, except from the argument made by the Senator from Colorado. If that be the purpose, I submit that the amendment should be more carefully framed than it is as it stands now.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, of course this apparent doubt does not really exist in the mind of the Senator from Iowa. He knows perfectly well that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is not, as a matter of fact, in the guise of anything else in the world, attempting to do anything except exactly what the language of the amendment shows it is intended to do, the purpose of which has been stated with entire frankness by everybody who has spoken upon the subject; and nothing I have stated this morning changes in the slightest degree either the apparent or the real meaning at least of this member of the committee or of any other member who has seen fit to address the Senate on the subject. The fact is, that it is not under the guise of anything. This is a simple, honest attempt to bring about a knowledge of the question as to whether or not it is not wise that the lesser post-offices of the country should be consolidated as nearly as possible, and as frequently as possible, and as often as practicable, with the greater commercial centers connected with the small offices by improved methods of transportation, whereby the public will be better, more efficiently, and more cheaply served. That is the only guise under which we are here masquerading.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I meant what I said in no offensive sense. But the Senator in his argument stated that, under existing conditions, if a postmaster 5,000 miles away wanted to secure a bundle of twine or the necessary wrapping paper to conduct the business of a small office, he must send to Washington for it and have it sent to him; and therefore, if this consolidation could be made, it would concentrate the distribution of the supplies necessary to the conduct of the post-offices more nearly to those offices. If that be true, it would require a change in our entire arrangement and adjustment, not only of the post-office regulations, but also in the appropriations; because now it is true that if a postmaster in San Francisco or in the neighborhood of San Francisco, or in Oregon or Alaska, needs a bundle of twine or wrapping paper, he would have to make a requisition and send to the Post-Office Department here for it. That requisition would, under the contract, be filled up, a supply of the articles sent to the postmaster himself, and an account kept of it. That was what I said, that if it was the intention to so enlarge the amendment as to gather in all the suggestions made by the Senator from Colorado, I thought it was too important an amendment to be placed upon an appropriation bill. That is all I meant to say.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, nothing has been said on that subject that was not said with a great deal more emphasis on Thursday last. It was, in effect, that those of us at least who believed in the policy of this amendment looked forward with the most pleasurable anticipation to the time when all these small offices would be consolidated with the offices nearer to them in such a way that the public would be better and more cheaply served, and the Department saved from the necessity of opening trivial accounts with postmasters thousands of miles away, where they can not be properly served and can not be properly inspected.

On Thursday last, I am inclined to think—although I had not been to see the Postmaster-General—I did a great injustice respecting the post-office at Ellicott City. I am advised that there was no sort of politics affecting that change, and that, instead of being 14 miles distant, it is 9¾ miles distant from Baltimore, and that all the leading offices around Baltimore have been consolidated with it. It is true that dissociated and unconnected offices in the country have not been so consolidated, but where they were in the direct line of the business of the Department the post-offices were sought to be gathered together.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator, of course, is now only making a statement which comes to him secondhand.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Certainly; and I am subject to correction.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator does not speak of his own personal knowledge. I desire to say to him that his statement is not correct and that he has been misinformed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In what respect, will the Senator state, am I misinformed?

Mr. GORMAN. I will tell the Senator. The Senator's statement was a little inaccurate on Thursday last, when he said that the post-offices between Baltimore and Ellicott City on a direct line had been jumped over and Ellicott City included in the classified service. The fact is, that there was first an extension from the Baltimore City post-office, embracing the villages near at hand, Towson, Catonsville, and Stephenson. Not satisfied with making the service apply to villages within 2 miles or 2½ miles of the city limits of Baltimore, a circle of 10 miles was drawn around the city of Baltimore, including agricultural communities, and embracing within the Baltimore City service nearly all the post-offices within that 10-mile circle, while the only direct communication between Baltimore and Ellicott City is by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which runs out to the Relay House and then up the Patapsco River, and when they came to the Relay House they jumped next to Ilchester, within the 10-mile limit, which they exempted. Then they came to Ellicott City and embraced that; and then above Ellicott City, still within the 10-mile limit, they left out the little office there. There can not be any question of personal knowledge about it, for it is in my own county. I know all about it, and the Senator from Colorado is simply misinformed.

When it comes to the reasons for making this proposed change, I hope I shall be able to show the Senator from Colorado that at least those of us who represent Maryland know a little more about the affairs of that State than my distinguished friend the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will say that I do not assume to understand the political affairs of Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. No.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And I certainly do not undertake to keep track of the quarrels of the Senator from Maryland with members of his own party.

Mr. GORMAN. I have no quarrels.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am simply endeavoring to do my duty here and endeavoring to meet the most astounding amendment that the most solemn body of people, known as the Committee on Appropriations, has ever put on an appropriation bill, to the effect that no post-offices could be discontinued where they were at county seats; and then the Senator from Maryland accepted the exception in favor of Cambridge. There had never been but three county seats where the offices had been consolidated, two of them in Maryland and one in Massachusetts, which were excepted from the provisions of the law, and the Committee on Appropriations is very much afraid that under the guise of doing something we want to do something else respecting this amendment, and has finally brought in an amendment which provides that the office at a county seat shall not be consolidated.

The information that I received as to Ellicott City from the Post-Office Department is as follows:

Although there are a few small offices on the steam-railroad line between Ellicott City and Baltimore not taken into this consolidation, their receipts are very small, ranging from $40 up to about $200, and the postmaster's salary ranging from about $30 up to $150; and the moment they are consolidated they must be taken care of by the clerk-hire appropriation, and at the same time, there being no electric lines to these places, their service would not be increased, as was the case with Ellicott City, and temporarily were left out of the consolidation. This applies for the same reason to other small post-offices within this radius of 10 miles.

Excepting it apparently in good faith. Of course I can not speak from my own knowledge; I can not walk through that county and look at those post-offices and examine the books, but I must take the statement of the Department, which is the statement I have, and upon that statement I relied in perfect good faith until the Senator from Maryland corrected me. If there are errors in the statement, I have no doubt the Senator will point them out. But whether or not there are political differences of opinion between a Department of this Government and any one of these Senators, if the public service is to be furthered and helped and increased by the consolidation of these offices, then I say that private differences should give way for the public service.

For one I shall be very glad to reach a vote upon this amendment. To me personally it is a matter of entire indifference whether the amendment passes or not. I can see that the amendment will probably fail. It does not meet the approval of the Committee on Appropriations; it was reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; it has not the approval nor the important seal of the confidence of the Committee on Appropriations; but, Mr. President, the agitation of the question ought to bring before the people the knowledge that the affairs of the post-office should be conducted as a business, wisely and economically, and that they are not so conducted because the legislative department of this Government desires that they shall be controlled as a political machine, which will, in its time and in its own good season, work its own cure. The time will come when the people of this country will invest the smaller post-offices of this Government in proper hands and will not require one officer at the seat of Government to personally conduct the affairs of 70,000 offices, 50,000 of which bring in less than $50 a year, and which are increasing at the rate of over 2,000 a year.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] seems to place the discussion of this question on an unusually low plane for him. He seemed in his closing remarks to intimate, if he did not state, that this is a mere personal or political question. If it be a political question, I congratulate the Post-Office Department that a distinguished Senator on the other side of the Chamber is its defender. There has been a suspicion on the part of a great many Democrats that many acts of the Administration in Maryland could best be defended by some Republican; and I am delighted that the Senator from Colorado comes forth as the champion of a Department which is departing from the usage and also from the law, as I think, and which is now advocating the consolidation of all the post-offices in the Union under a hundred or a fewer heads, and to take from the people the right to select their own servants, the little fifty-dollar post-offices in their localities. I understand the Senator to say that is precisely what he is inaugurating, a system which will consolidate under some great city head and embrace within the civil service all these little country post-offices.

Against that, Mr. President, I protest. I protest against it not because of any political differences, not because the appointment of a postmaster for political purposes amounts to anything. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I have served in the Senate under Republican Administrations and Democratic Administrations, and the mere appointment of a postmaster has never been of any especial interest to me.

What I desire, if I can get it from Congress, is a provision in the pending bill that the post-office at the county seat in which I reside, and at every county seat, shall be maintained as an independent office. The Ellicott City post-office is as old as that of Baltimore City. It is a community as intelligent, it is a community as wealthy per capita as any county in the Union. The people there have a pride in having their office, and I insist that it shall be restored to them, knowing full well from recent events that any recommendation I might make for a postmaster would be rejected. It is therefore the office and not the officer that I contend for.

Mr. President, this attempt to place in the classified service all the fourth-class post-offices is civil-service attempt run mad. We passed an act authorizing the President by his proclamation at any time to place in the civil service the offices of the Government. It was intended for the great offices in Washington and the large custom-houses and post-offices in the cities. No man dreamt that it would be extended to the country post-offices at $50 each. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] says it will give better service; that it will give a service which will do no injustice to a locality; that under the order of the President and the Postmaster-General the local man who is in office will be retained. So he will be retained, but the moment a vacancy occurs by death or resignation then you go to the civil-service list under the order and take one of the first three who stand the highest upon the roster, no matter from what part of the State he may come, and send him to your village and to mine to distribute the letters and to look after our affairs.

It is not political, says the Senator from Colorado. The friends of the proposition protest that it is not political. They protest that it will give us better service. I see before me the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], who in sentiment is a thorough and complete civil-service reformer, as I have always understood him. He believes in applying it to the great Departments of the Government. He at one time held a high position in the Post-Office Department, and he did place the men in official positions in that Department here, and possibly the railway mail clerks, under civil service.

Mr. VILAS. There was no extension of the classified service to any of the offices of the Department during the time I was in the service. There were ample reasons, peculiar and special to the time, which were sufficient to require it to be delayed.

Mr. GORMAN. Then it followed by order of the successor in that office of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, I think.

But what was the operation of it? Under that Administration about one-half of all the railway mail clerks were changed and new men were installed. The Postmaster-General reported great efficiency in the service from the injection of new blood and new men. Then, under Postmaster-General Dickinson, came an order from the President of the United States placing them all under the civil service. No sooner had the Administration changed and Mr. Wanamaker become the Postmaster-General than that order was suspended, that the political friends of the distinguished Senator from Colorado might be installed. When they were, civil service was applied, and they stand to-day within the classified service. The Senator from Colorado says there is no politics in this movement. I could read to him from a statement of the civil-service reformers of Maryland that the very office in Baltimore, so far as it could be made, was a partisan machine and is a partisan machine. They did there the most extraordinary thing. On the 2d day of November a year ago, when the service there was all placed under the civil service, appointments were permitted to be made because the postmaster had verbally notified several gentlemen that they would be removed later on, but who were not removed until after the order went into effect. So far as my experience with the matter goes, the men who are shouting for civil service first aim to get their friends in office and then by an order they hope to keep them in for all time.

Mr. President, what is proposed here? The Postmaster-General says frankly that he proposes to extend this system, as the Senator has well said, until it covers all the offices in the country. The reorganization of the Post-Office Department so as to place it under a closer and more compact business arrangement has been the work of every Postmaster-General as the service has grown. It was Postmaster-General Wanamaker who conceived or rather enforced the idea that the whole country should be divided into a hundred districts and a principal officer stationed within each district to supervise the business of the small offices, consolidate the reports, and send them to the Post-Office Department. That was his scheme. It was so extreme, however, it involved so much, that Congress, both Republican and Democratic, has not authorized that it be carried out. The people are jealous of their right to go to the headquarters of their Government. Now comes the Postmaster-General, installed in office because of the success of the Democratic party at the last Presidential election, who makes a rule, adopts a line of action that was never contemplated by any of his predecessors and which no Congress, in my judgment, would ever have tolerated, absolutely by an order to wipe out any number of those small offices and consolidate them under one great head.

Chicago and Baltimore and New York and Boston and Brooklyn were contemplated. They were enlarged. In Baltimore first only the villages which had communication with the city by electric cars were involved, and then came the agricultural community which I have described. When it comes to the great city of Brooklyn, listen, Mr. President, to what the Postmaster-General says, that it would be well to consolidate under the Brooklyn post-office all the offices on Long Island, a stretch of land 90 miles in length. The plain intimation from his report and from the letter of the Postmaster-General to the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which is on the desk of every Senator, is that his intention is to proceed as the business will permit and bring within the embrace of each of those cities all of the post-offices in their vicinity. I take it, it would embrace the whole State of Maryland in the one post-office at Baltimore.

It does seem to me, sir, that there is a deliberate, a well-organized attempt, a thorough determination on the part of some gentlemen both in and outside of the Democratic party to take from the people of this country the opportunity to determine who shall be their public servants—to eliminate, to take away, as the Senator says, from Congressmen and Senators the bother of looking after the people's interests. In my view of it, no man has the right to be upon this floor or in the other House who thinks that his time is so valuable or his taste so æsthetic that he can not listen to the appeals of the people in his neighborhood who wish to have their little affairs attended to.

It is complained of the agitation about the small post-office, at the corner grocery, with the people excited and struggling for the office. This right is the very corner stone of our form of government. It is the agitation which keeps the waters from becoming stagnant. The people should assemble; and if controversies occur, have they not occurred by the thousand heretofore? Who is the worse off? Who suffers by it if the Postmaster-General or his numerous assistants are compelled to listen to their appeals? They had better be engaged in listening to the appeals of the people from those small places than to be delivering lectures upon the tariff, the currency, or any other question. When he accepts this employment he is the servant of the people. When he accepts it and attempts to consolidate his power, as is being attempted in this case, at the same time proclaiming that he is doing it in order that we may have a better civil service, one freed from politics, we had better go back to the old idea of the people in the country, and remember that when a man is constantly proclaiming his virtue and his honesty and distrusting everybody he can not meet with favor.

But the Senator says we are to have more frequent service, better service, more economical service. I do not understand how it is possible to have five or six more deliveries of mail in villages all over the country and more frequent collections of mail without multiplying the offices and increasing the pay in the aggregate. It will decrease some of the Presidential offices, which may be abolished, but it will increase by hundreds the carriers and the small clerks and will increase the army, already grown to 200,000, in the postal service. But it will do another thing that the Senator from Colorado does not take into account. It will give greater compensation to the railroads—the electric railroads and the steam railroads—and there is where the extravagance comes in the appropriations for the postal service. The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin demonstrated a year ago that the extravagance which exists in this Department came from that item, and those of us who have been giving attention to the amount of appropriations have looked forward to the time—and have hoped that it would be at the present session—when, with a revenue not sufficient to support the Government, the Post-Office Department, as one of the great Departments of the Government, would present a bill through the Post-Office Committee cutting down those extravagant charges and saving the people money without reducing the service. Instead of that we come to the proposition presented by the distinguished Senator from Colorado, to take from the people, under the guise of reform, their right to select their own postmasters in their neighborhoods.

The Senator from Colorado was not quite frank, and it was unlike him. He read the order of the President of the United States embracing within the classified service the postmasters who are already in. That is true. But it lasts only so long as the present incumbent lasts. When he passes away from any cause—by removal, death, or resignation—then you go to the eligible list of the civil service, and it is nine chances out of ten that no man would be selected as a clerk in my village who is a resident there.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from Maryland——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from Maryland will recall that I distinctly stated that it applies only to the present incumbent; that when he passes away or leaves another clerk will take his place.

Mr. GORMAN. I overlooked the Senator's statement. I understand the correction.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator will find it when he looks over my remarks.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senator whether he advocates distinctly a proposition that would end in bringing a man from a distance, from another neighborhood or another county, to act as postmaster in his own town or county?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I would with the same cheerfulness that I take my letter which is brought by railway post in a car from a man who may live in Kalamazoo or Calcutta. I do not care where he lives so long as he brings my letter on a railroad train. What do I care as to the place of his birth or his residence? It does not make the slightest difference in the world to me where the man lives.

Mr. GORMAN. Then I can——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say that the presiding genius of the Post-Office Department in Colorado comes from West Virginia. It is not satisfactory, but so long as we get our letters we do not care.

Mr. GORMAN. The Postmaster-General?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; I refer to the inspectors of our post-offices in Colorado.

Mr. GORMAN. That is the general departmental service here. Now, the Senator would apply this system to the little postmaster at the corner store in my own neighborhood and his, and merely because some man from the city of Denver or the city of Baltimore has passed the examination he would like to have him located in his neighborhood. Is it not monstrous that we are to have men imported from other localities to hold local offices? Are we to see it inaugurated here under the name of civil service? Does the Senator from Colorado or any other Senator know of a postmaster in one of the great cities who does not deal in politics to some extent? He ought to do it. He ought to take an interest in the affairs of his country, no matter what his politics is. Then human nature follows; it has followed, or it exists, and to a certain extent he uses the force he has to carry out his own views. He may proclaim his virtues every morning, but he nevertheless uses the power and the information which he has from this great corps of men to promote his own views or the views of the master who appoints him.

Sir, the safety of our institutions, the safety of the Government, depend on having this power distributed, permitting the people to determine in their own way who shall be their servants in these important little places in their localities. I trust, Mr. President, that Congress will not give its sanction to this beginning of the consolidation of the great power of this Postmaster-General or any other Postmaster-General. I hope to see the time when we shall have a Postmaster-General, no matter what his politics may be, who will reform the Department, who will cut down its expenditures without diminishing the efficiency of the service, and when we have that it will be done on the lines I have indicated by cutting down extraordinary compensation for the carriage of mails and high salaries, and promoting the interests of the small post-offices which are in touch with the people.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, during my service here I have not been connected with any of the great committees which have supervision of the affairs of the Post-Office Department. My attention was arrested last week when this discussion commenced, and I noticed that for the first time an effort was being made to establish by law a system providing for stations and substations and post-office districts. It is quite probable that very many advantages may come from such a system, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] stated to us in his remarks this morning, but it is new legislation, and in this apparently innocent amendment we have really a very great change in the statutory law of the country. The amendment provides—

That whenever, by order of the Postmaster-General, any post-office is consolidated with any office so as to become a station or substation of the same, the salary of the superintendent or clerk in charge of such station or substation may then be paid out of the appropriation, etc.

I speak of the amendment as first introduced. I am satisfied that if the amendment shall be adopted the word "station" or "substation" will appear in the legislation of the country for the first time in connection with the Post-Office Department. I have examined the statutes with reference to postal affairs from the beginning of the Government, and nowhere do I find any authority whatever for the establishment of a station or substation of the Post-Office Department. We were informed by Senators who took part in the discussion on Thursday that this condition of affairs has existed ever since the formation of the Government; that it was established when Benjamin Franklin was made Postmaster-General. But I have been unable to find any authority whatever for that statement.

The first time that anything of the sort is found in the legislation of Congress is in 1862, when there was a provision made for the establishment of branch post-offices; and I understand that upon that foundation all this subsequent action has been based. This law appears in the twelfth volume of the Statutes at Large, and is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Postmaster-General be authorized and directed, when in his judgment the public interest or convenience may require it, to establish one or more branch post-offices, to facilitate the operation of the post-office in any city or place which, in the opinion of the Postmaster-General, may require such additional accommodations for the convenience of the inhabitants; and it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General to prescribe the rules and regulations for the branch post-office which may be established by virtue of this act.

Then it goes on to provide that there shall be additional postage on letters deposited and delivered through those branch offices. It will be seen that this legislation provided that the branch offices should be for the convenience of the inhabitants and that they should be operated in the city or place where the original post-office was established. It was not contemplated that there should be any exercise of authority beyond the limits of the city or the town where the principal office is located.

This remained the law until 1872, ten years later, when a general law was passed consolidating the laws which related to the Post-Office Department. It is a law approved June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department." Section 98 of that statute provides—

That the Postmaster-General, when the public convenience requires it, may establish within any post-office delivery one or more branch offices, for the receipt and delivery of mail matter and the sale of stamps and envelopes; and he shall prescribe the rules and regulations for the government thereof. But no letter shall be sent for delivery to any branch office contrary to the request of the party to whom it is addressed.

The main difference between this law and the one passed in 1862 is that the branch offices were to be established within the post-office delivery, and, in my judgment, the plain meaning of that was that it should be within the limits of the city or town where the principal office was located, and that it should not be extended beyond.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Florida read that clause again? I did not fully hear it.

Mr. PASCO. It provides:

That the Postmaster-General, when the public convenience requires it, may establish within any post-office delivery one or more branch offices for the receipt and delivery of mail matter and the sale of stamps and envelopes, and he shall prescribe the rules and regulations for the government thereof.

There was no provision that a station should be provided for the city of Cambridge or the city of Worcester or the city of Lowell, in Massachusetts. They were not within the delivery of the Boston post-office. They were separate and independent offices, and it could not have been within the contemplation of those who passed this law that there should be any general authority to wipe out, to discontinue, and abolish all the post-offices in a particular district of country and establish in their places a lot of stations and substations.

There is no hint at any such power in this statute, and there certainly is none in the statute which preceded it. There is no other statute that I can find which relates to this subject-matter, and in neither of these statutes is there any mention of or authority for the establishment of stations and substations. The establishment of such stations and substations was not the work of Congress, but, in my judgment, purely the result of departmental construction. It was not Congressional law, but departmental law.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to ask the Senator from Florida a question. When did I understand him to state that the establishment of substations was first authorized?

Mr. PASCO. I say it was never authorized by Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. It never was authorized?

Mr. PASCO. It never was authorized. I say that the branch post-offices were first authorized in 1862, and that when this subsequent statute gathering together all the legislation with reference to the Post-Office Department was passed in 1872 the statute passed in 1862 was incorporated with a little change in the new law, and the statement that this system and condition of things date back to the days of Benjamin Franklin is a mistake, and so far as I can find has no substantial foundation.

Mr. ALLEN. When was the Postmaster-General first authorized to convert a regularly established post-office into a substation of some other post-office?

Mr. PASCO. I have not been connected with the work of the Post-Office Department through any of the committees of this body in such a way as to enable me to give the Senator the information.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida who made the statement that the power to establish substations dates from the time of Benjamin Franklin and where the statement is found?

Mr. PASCO. I find it on page 3485 of the RECORD.

Mr. ALLEN. It was made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

Mr. PASCO. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] said:

The law as it stands now gives the Postmaster-General power to establish or discontinue a post-office at pleasure. It gives him power to establish substations within any post-office district, and it is within his power to define what the post-office district shall be.

Thereupon the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] said:

Then I understand the Senator to assert this——

The Senator from Wisconsin went on:

But I wish to add that it is not to be presumed that a law which has existed like that since the beginning of the Government, since the establishment of the Post-Office Department under Benjamin Franklin, is to be abused as is indicated by that question.

After an interruption by the Senator from Nebraska, which interruption was as follows:

Mr. ALLEN. But I do not understand that since the time of Benjamin Franklin the law has existed to establish subpost-offices. I understand that the power to establish or abolish a post-office exists, but what I want to know of the Senator——

The Senator from Wisconsin said:

It has existed since the system was begun.

Mr. VILAS. I wanted to understand the Senator's reference. I will make that statement plain in a few moments.

Mr. PASCO. If there is any other authority than that which I have read, any statute in this country authorizing the establishments of stations or substations, I should like to see such authority or statute now, or to have it produced during the progress of this discussion. As I said before, in my opinion it is the result of departmental construction, and it is not Congressional law. I can not state, in answer to the question of the Senator from Nebraska, when this system was commenced, but I find that at the present time it is going on at a rapid rate. The report offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], and from which he read this morning, shows that during last year the number of post-offices discontinued has been 94, and in their place a lot of stations and substations have been established in different places, in Illinois, Maryland, New York, Massachusetts, and other States. This statement is found on pages 5 and 6 of Report No. 592, made by the Senator from Colorado in reporting the amendment.

Mr. VILAS. I should like also to ask the Senator from Florida what he understands the delivery of a post-office to be under the law to which he has made reference?

Mr. PASCO. I think that history teaches us, certainly it is within the experience and knowledge of every Senator who has lived thirty or forty years, as the Senator from Wisconsin and myself have, that the delivery of an office was always understood to be the country within reach of and immediately around the office, occupied by the people who did business with the office and who went there to receive their letters and went there to mail their letters; and it never was contemplated that the delivery of a post-office extended 30, 40, 50, or 100 miles off from the place where the post-office was established. There is nothing in any of the statutes defining what delivery is, but in connection with the prior statute which I read, which says that these stations and substations were to be established within the city where the post-office was located or established, I think the proper and fair construction is that branch post-offices, to use the statutory designation, were to be established within the limits of the cities and towns where the office was established.

Now, Mr. President, on looking a little further into the matter (I have not had much time to examine it since Thursday, when the question came up before the Senate), I find that a project is on foot to establish districts which may, when the system is carried out to the full extent, extend all over the country. Already there is a proposition to consolidate all the country in the eastern part of Massachusetts into a single district, and the postmasters at those different offices are to be mere superintendents of stations and clerks. I suppose the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is for the purpose of facilitating the carrying out of this scheme, and giving it for the first time some legislative recognition. I was very glad the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] excluded from the operations of this intended arrangement the city of Cambridge, the seat of the grand old university of Harvard.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Florida will pardon me, by the exception Cambridge is kept within the metropolitan district. The object of my amendment was to prevent its being taken out and reestablished as a separate post-office, because the service is so much better.

Mr. PASCO. The Senator then wishes Cambridge to be simply a substation?

Mr. LODGE. Cambridge is now and has been for years a part of the metropolitan district of Boston.

Mr. PASCO. Then, Mr. President, this matter has gone on a great deal further than I knew anything about. I supposed that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts was to spare Cambridge from being put down simply as a substation of the Boston post-office.

Mr. LODGE. The proposed change in the law, which was put in by the Committee on Appropriations in order to oblige the Senator from Maryland, a member of the committee, included Cambridge; that is, because it is a county seat, it took it out of the present metropolitan district. As the change was made many years ago and resulted in better service, and nobody I knew of wanted it changed back again, I asked to have Cambridge remain as it is at present.

Mr. PASCO. How many years ago did that change take place?

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall how many, but a good many years ago. It has been so for a long time.

Mr. PASCO. It then took place long since the Senator and I were at college?

Mr. LODGE. Yes, since I was in college, I am sorry to say.

Mr. PASCO. Now, Mr. President, I am not in favor of wiping out the old-fashioned post-office. I do not believe there will be any advantage to the civil service of the country in establishing these districts and subdistricts instead of post-offices. They may cover a large territory, perhaps entire Congressional districts. They may extend over two or three States. Some of the smaller States may be swept into a district of another State. I am not in favor of abolishing the lines of towns and counties and States. I believe in retaining the post-offices in the same form and covering the same territory that they have had ever since the foundation of the Government until this new scheme, which has crept into existence through the action of a Department, has made a change. I do not believe that we are going to escape political interference simply by changing post-offices into postal districts. I am in favor of a reasonable civil-service reform, but I do not believe that this will advance it.

When we divide up a State into two or three postal districts we make vast organizations, and we make, in one sense, vast machines; and as long as the condition of things exists in this country that exists to-day, whenever we have these vast machines there will be some way or other of managing them in a political sense; they will be political factors, no matter what you call them. You may have all the civil-service rules that exist and a great many more, but you will not by that means take these organizations out of the operation of political influence. They who are united in the management of these post-office districts, whether as clerks or as superintendents, or in other positions, will in some way work together and bring their action together, and they will have their influence upon the politics of their districts and of the country.

I hastily prepared an amendment on Thursday for the purpose of preventing the extension of this change and of bringing back the postal service of the country in this respect to what it was for a hundred years after the Government was organized. I hesitated whether to offer it as an amendment to the pending amendment or as a separate amendment. I believe I will test the views of the Senate on this question, and it is a very interesting and important one. I regret very much that it is brought in here in the fag end of a debate on an appropriation bill. I think if this great change in the postal system of the country is to be made, if it is to be recognized by law, it should be done in a separate and independent statute; and we should know well what we are doing when we make a change of so great importance and consequence as this is. I offered the amendment, but without stating definitely whether it was to be an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado or not. I shall now offer it as an amendment to that amendment. It is found on page 3490 of the RECORD. I will read it:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the establishment of any substation or branch office beyond the limits of any city or town in which the principal office is established.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to propose an amendment right here to that amendment?

Mr. PASCO. I will listen to any suggestion the Senator from New York may wish to make.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I suggest that, inasmuch as the Senator from Florida says he does not know whether he is going to offer this as an amendment to the pending amendment or as a separate amendment——

Mr. PASCO. Oh, no.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Perhaps the Senator from New York would like to ascertain where the tail of his kite is to land.

Mr. PASCO. The Senator from Colorado misstates me. He was not listening to what I said.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I did listen, and I will ask to have read what the Senator said.

Mr. PASCO. I stated that on Thursday I was uncertain whether to offer it as an original amendment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understood the Senator to say he was not certain whether he would offer it as an amendment or not.

Mr. PASCO. That shows the Senator was not listening.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I now understand the Senator to say that. I hope he will correct me. I am in perfect good faith about it. Does not the Senator now say so? Senators about me so understood him.

Mr. PASCO. If the Senator is through I will state what I wish to say. He keeps on interrupting me. I will wait until he has finished.

I said on Thursday, when this matter was up, I was uncertain whether I should offer it as a separate amendment or as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, but that, in order to test the sense of the Senate upon this legislation, which I went on to say I regarded as important and that I did not think it ought to be brought in at the fag-end of the discussion upon an appropriation bill, but that, being a very important matter, and in order to test the views of the Senate, I should offer it now as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, and at that stage I was interrupted by the Senator from New York, to whom I very cheerfully yielded to propose a modification of the amendment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to explain to the Senator from Florida that I regret extremely if I misquoted him. I did not intend to do so. I certainly did not mean to ruffle his feelings.

Mr. PASCO. I do not suppose that the Senator from Colorado desired to misquote me and his statement is satisfactory, but my wish is to test the question by offering my amendment as an amendment to his, and this is now my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HILL. I will wait until the Senator is through.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to hear the suggestion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. After the word "authorize," in line 1, I suggest to insert the words "or permit"; after the word "establishment" to insert the word "hereafter"; and in line 2, after the word "beyond," to insert the words "5 miles outside of." Will the Senator from Florida pardon me a moment?

Mr. PASCO. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. When the amendment of the Senator from Colorado was first suggested, I believed that it had reference to the consolidation of post-offices very near large towns and cities. In that view I was disposed to support it. For instance, Boston was cited as one of the places where the amendment could well apply. I can see no reason why, in certain cities where the boundaries are very limited in their character, where towns have grown up in the immediate vicinity that really constitute a part of the city in fact, but not according to law, it would not be proper to have substations, and in that view I can see no objection to the amendment.

Mr. President, from the debate already had it seems to me the scheme embraces something far beyond this, and that it is an entering wedge for something new. I simply suggest to the Senate that if some grand new scheme is to be inaugurated that is to overturn the system which has been in existence for years it had better be done in some other place than on an appropriation bill. I am disposed to vote against any amendment of this character whatever to an appropriation bill, but we find before us an amendment relating to the subject, and if the bill is to be amended at all in this respect it should be amended correctly.

I am not going to discuss the great question of civil-service reform which has been so well discussed here this morning. If we are to have a change in the post-offices of the country upon that basis let the Post-Office Committee or some other committee bring in a bill to that effect and we will discuss it on its merits. If the whole of Long Island, which embraces three county seats, a vast territory 100 miles and over in length, is to be embraced in one post-office substantially and all the rest are to be substations—if that is the scheme I want to know it. I will discuss it when the question comes up; but I must object to this provision being inserted in this way if it means that. I am with the Senator from Colorado on the general proposition of including the small post-offices within the incorporated limits or just within the outskirts, and such places are numerous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be read.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside in order that we may continue the consideration of the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. HILL. Let us proceed one step at a time. I do not believe that there is really any objection here to the scheme of consolidating post-offices within the very reasonable distance of a great city. If that is what is contemplated, and it requires additional legislation to do it, then we are in favor of it. My amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Florida simply fixes the limit. There must be some arbitrary limit. Five miles is a sufficient limit. I am not familiar enough with the territory around Boston to know how far Cambridge is from the limits of the city. I presume it is not over 5 miles, but I am not familiar with it; it may be more.

Mr. President, there must be some limit. Five miles will give a chance to consolidate all the little post-offices on the outskirts of cities, and I am with the amendment to that extent. I am disposed to object to it beyond that, at this time, on an appropriation bill. Whether this scheme is a wise one or not (and we have heard many arguments from the Senator from Colorado that it would be a wise one), let it be brought in as a separate bill that we may direct the Postmaster-General just what he shall do or shall not do. Let us know just what is to be done. I object to legislating in the dark and to have such measures for reform carried out by departmental officers and the first thing we know about it is when we are confronted with the scheme. I should like to consult with the people of Long Island, embracing three counties, before any department of the Government shall abolish all the offices within that Territory of a hundred miles in extent. I want to see what is proposed; I want to see how it affects the whole State, and how it affects the country. If we are to proceed to legislate upon the true lines of civil-service reform let the whole scheme be presented, so that we may act intelligently.

I do not propose to discuss the great question involved here any further than I have done. I am willing to go to the extent of limiting the consolidation to within 5 miles of the cities. That would be far enough, in my judgment. Of course the limitation as to the county seat can also remain in—it is there now; that they shall not take away the post-office from a county seat. Therefore, if there is such an instance where a county seat is within 5 miles I do not think it should be consolidated. The two provisions can stand together. The change shall not be made at the county seat and it shall not be done unless within 5 miles of the limits of the city.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PASCO. I would rather settle the question as to the amendment before I give up the floor. I suggest to the Senator from New York that his amendment is rather doubtful with reference to the limit. Has he examined it carefully? I understand the purpose and object of it. The words come in after "beyond."

Mr. HILL. Yes; "beyond 5 miles outside of the limits of the city or town."

Mr. PASCO. Would it not be better to say "5 miles beyond the limits"?

Mr. HILL. Yes; that makes it a little better.

Mr. PASCO. I merely want it to express the meaning.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Florida permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. PASCO. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. A limit which might be proper in the case of a large city would be entirely too great in the case of a small city. I have in my mind certain small towns which are clustered comparatively near together, and it would be a very great hardship to consolidate all the post-offices in the limits of a town that might be no larger than some of the neighboring towns.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Florida allow me a minute?

Mr. PASCO. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I have an amendment to propose which I think will cover and meet the views both of the Senator from Florida and the Senator from New York. Will the Senator from Florida give me the floor?

Mr. PASCO. Will the Senator from Minnesota have his amendment read?

Mr. NELSON. I will read it, and I should like to make a few remarks.

Mr. PASCO. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I offer an amendment, to come in at the end of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that was adopted at the end of line 6. His amendment excepted from the proviso the post-office at Cambridge, I think. At the end of that clause, I move to insert the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That no post-office situate in the midst of a farming community and not directly connected by streets and street-car service of any kind with the post-office with which it is proposed to consolidate the same shall be consolidated with any other post-office or abolished or discontinued.

Mr. President, in support of this amendment I ask leave to say a few words. I was astonished the other day when I heard the claim made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] as to the powers of the Post-Office Department to consolidate, and I was still more astonished when I heard the statement of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] as to the fact that the post-office at Ellicott City had been consolidated with Baltimore. I know something about Ellicott City. I carried a musket in the streets of that city in 1861 and I know that it is as disconnected from the city of Baltimore as is the city of Alexandria from Washington. You might as well consolidate the city of Alexandria, across the river here in Virginia, with the city of Washington as to consolidate the city of Ellicott Mills or Ellicott City with the post-office at Baltimore. It is entirely disconnected. On a branch line going by rail from Baltimore it must be upward of 14 or 15 miles from the city of Baltimore, and it has no other than an ordinary rail connection on a branch line; it is not on the line between Washington and Baltimore.

More than that, Ellicott City is the county seat of one of the prosperous counties in Maryland, and it is in the midst of a fine farming community. There are a large number of farms between that place and the city of Baltimore. I confess that when I heard the other day the fact that it had been consolidated and made a substation of Baltimore I became perfectly frightened, not knowing what might happen in my own part of the country. I did not know but that if this scheme of consolidation should prevail they would undertake to consolidate all the little offices with the office at the county seat, making one great post-office for the whole county.

Within recent years there has been a revolution going on in the commercial world in the way of stores, commerce, and traffic. A few years ago we had little stores, each handling one line of goods. We had clothing in one store; we had dry goods in another; we had stores for boots and shoes; we had hardware stores, and we had furniture stores, each store managed by the owner himself, with the aid of a few clerks who were treated almost as his equals, and the public were well accommodated. All that is being fast done away with. It went out of existence by that devil-fish of modern society, the department stores. The department stores have crushed out everything in the commercial world, and we have a great big chief man who sits in his office and plans how to consolidate all the different varieties of trade and commerce under one single roof; his clerks and employees are treated practically as an army of serfs, and the public at large get, to be sure, cheaper goods, but they are oftentimes nastier.

Mr. President, I believe that the department stores are a curse in the commercial world, and I should like to see them eliminated. I am opposed to injecting the department system into the post-office system. I do not believe in reducing it to the mere basis of a department store, a mere matter of dollars and cents.

In most of our local and municipal affairs the people deal with the constitutions and the laws of their respective States. It is only in little matters that they occasionally come in contact with the Federal Government. Those who are wealthy and who do a large business have the luxury of coming in contact with the Federal Government in the United States; but with the most of us in the everyday affairs of life the connecting link with our Federal Government here at Washington is the Post-Office Department. Would you, Mr. President, for the sake of a few dollars and cents, sever this connection and reduce our postal system, just for the sake of the almighty dollar, to the mere principle and basis of a department store? I hope that the American people have not got to that low level. From what little I know of the feeling of the public at large, it is that there is no fault found with the expenses of the Post-Office Department. There is not a Department of this Government in whose affairs the people take so much interest and the expenses of which are so cheerfully borne. I am sorry to see that this Department is put on the mere basis of dollars and cents. We want a good postal service, and we want that service to be on the old fashion, so that the postmasters of our little places in the country can be a part of the community in which they live and be looked up to as leaders.

It does not cut much figure whether the postmasters be Democrats or Republicans. The great body of the American people belong to one or the other of these parties, and they do not care to have a mere machine, a mere Department clerk, put into a post-office. We want a representative of our common humanity, whether he be a Democrat or a Republican, and we want him there as the representative of our great Government. If we put no limitations upon it and leave to the Postmaster-General unlimited power of consolidation, there is no telling to what it may lead. I have before me a letter of the Postmaster-General on this subject. He first cites the opinion of Postmaster-General Wanamaker, in which he recommended that the country be divided into districts, and a head placed over each district. Then he cites the opinion of Postmaster-General Bissell, in which he suggests something of a similar kind. Then the Postmaster-General adds:

> Fortunately, the natural growth of the country, and the consequent development of the postal service, has suggested a plan which, by the test of experiments already made, promises to effect this substantial improvement without further legislation than an increase in the allowance for clerk hire, more than counterbalanced by a still larger decrease in the appropriation for the salaries of postmasters.
> This plan contemplates the consolidation of smaller and contiguous post-offices with the free-delivery offices.

There is no limit to this, and unless we in this legislation inject some limit, this thing may go on without limit. As I say, there is nothing under it to hinder the Postmaster-General from taking and consolidating all the offices in a rural community, with the office at the county seat, and having all the little offices mere suburban stations, with one great office in the county.

I wish to say that the American people want nothing of that kind. They want the old system as we have had it in the country in many forms. It is all right if you consolidate the little suburban towns that are connected with the large cities by electric cars and by interurban cars and streets at places where men do business, and go and spend their evenings and stay over night. That is all right; but you do, as has been done in the case of Baltimore and Ellicott City, a great wrong to the people of the United States and a great wrong to the whole postal system.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. PASCO. I had the floor and yielded it, and I should like to dispose of the proposition to amend the amendment that I offered. It will take but a moment, if the Senator from Massachusetts will yield to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I only desired to speak to the amendment which has been pending.

Mr. PASCO. I suppose I had better put the amendment in proper shape before it is discussed. I think the amendment as I originally offered it might enable us to test the views of the Senate with reference to the establishment of these substations, and I prefer the language in which I have already prepared it to that offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and without adopting the suggestion offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. I do not accept any of the proposed amendments, and shall offer the amendment in the language in which it was originally proposed, and with that language will submit it to the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator offer the amendment now?

Mr. PASCO. I have already offered it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, a great many objections have been made to this amendment which has been moved by the Senator from Colorado and which I originally had the pleasure of presenting to the Senate for the consideration of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

I think as the debate has proceeded we have got gradually down to the real objection to the amendment. We were first told that it enlarged enormously the powers of the Postmaster-General. It does not, Mr. President. It does not add to his powers, nor will it deduct from his powers. The power which he has had from the beginning is the power to establish and discontinue post-offices. The Post-Office Department can not be carried on without that power, and nobody proposes to take that power away from the Postmaster-General, and nobody can. Under that power this matter of the establishment of branch offices, that is, of post-offices in another form, has grown up. It can not be stopped; it is bound to go on. The only question is whether we shall struggle against it and show how far behind the times we are, or whether we shall provide for its being done properly and sensibly. The modern department shop may be a terrible thing, but you are not going to prevent people doing business in the cheapest, most expeditious, and best way by assailing them in the Senate. The best methods of doing business, whether in the postal service or in trade, are going to prevail, and there is no use of trying to stop it by legislation.

Another objection that has been made is that post-offices are to be abolished. Nobody proposes to abolish post-offices. It is a perfectly disingenuous objection. There is to be substituted for one kind of post-office another kind of post-office, and that is all—for a clumsy system a better system. Then lurid pictures have been drawn of sweeping the country post-offices of a whole State into a metropolitan district, thus introducing into a town or a harmless village some dangerous stranger from the classified service who happens to have been born in another village of the same State. All these awful pictures have been conjured up to frighten the Senate.

Mr. President, the Postmaster-General has the power of putting offices into a single district, and he is going to exercise it with reasonable discretion. There is no possibility of providing by law against every conceivable abuse of power. It is to be assumed that a Cabinet officer will exercise his powers reasonably. He is not going to rush out and take in all the country post-offices in a State or do any other absurd thing; but where a large city is so situated that a number of suburban post-offices can be advantageously consolidated with it, it is going to be done. It is certain to come sooner or later.

Mr. President, the system of consolidation which has been going on for some years has brought economy. That is a matter provable by figures. It is not true to say that it is said to have brought economy; it has brought it. In 90 post-offices consolidated last year the average saving has been $350 annually per office. The system of consolidation also brings better service as a matter of fact. It is not a matter of experiment or prediction.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is quite aware, from his familiarity with business, that consolidation in railroads, in mills, in telegraph offices, and anything else almost always brings greater economy in the management of the business. It requires fewer persons, perhaps, and gives better service in the end.

But, Mr. President, none of these objections is the real objection to this amendment. The amendment will give better service and will give more economy. It abolishes no offices; it does not add to the Postmaster-General's power; it does not deduct from it. The real objection and the foundation of the opposition to it here is that it facilitates changing certain kinds of post-offices into post-offices of another kind. The postmasters at those new offices will cease to be the creatures of patronage, and will become clerks. That is the real source of the opposition to this amendment.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has just told us that he wants the postmasters to belong to our common humanity and not be men taken from the classified service. I should like to know, Mr. President, after a man has passed an examination in an honorable way, and when he has got an appointment under his Government in a fair and honorable way, how he ceased to belong to our common humanity? Is the only being who has got common humanity in him the man who has done some political service to the Congressman in the district? I think not. Those men from the classified service are better fitted for their duties than the men who are selected after a bitter village wrangle as to who shall have the post-office, which the Senator from Maryland tells us is the corner stone of American Government—think of it, fighting over small post-offices the corner stone of Amercan Government!

As to the county seats, that amendment has been put in the bill by the Committee on Appropriations so that they can not possibly be consolidated, and it appears that there are three county seats affected, two in Maryland and one in Massachusetts. I asked to have Cambridge omitted because it was consolidated some years ago with the Boston office. I have never heard it questioned that the result was better service. This outrage, Mr. President, was consummated on the people of Cambridge almost without their knowing it. That is a city of 70,000 inhabitants. It is quite as old a city and—I say it with all respect—it is quite as famous a city as Ellicott City, near Baltimore, and yet the people of Cambridge seem to have borne this outrage on their rights with perfect philosophy. They have not been stirred up to anger, but, on the contrary, I think they have welcomed the better service that they have obtained. The only reason that Cambridge is brought into this discussion is because it happened to be a county seat. There are a number of other large cities of separate corporate limits near to Boston which have been consolidated with Boston's postal service, but, not being county seats, they do not necessarily come up in this discussion.

I have said, Mr. President, that the real objection to this amendment was because it took away a few fourth-class postmasters, or second or third class postmasters, and turned them ultimately into the classified service. It takes very few. As the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] has suggested, it perhaps in one year would take a thousand, and we should make 2,000 fourth-class offices in that time. Personally I am very glad to have them consolidated and have them put into the classified service, but it is a very trifling advance in the right direction, as it seems to me. I wish it went much further and that every fourth-class office could be taken finally out of politics. But I am glad to get anything that tends in that direction.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the pathetic appeals which have been made to leave the people their rights; to the earnest objections that we were depriving the people of their rights by taking from them a fourth-class or third-class postmaster here and there and changing him ultimately into a clerk in the classified service. I think we might as well be honest about this business.

Mr. President, the only people Senators are disturbed about in this connection are themselves and members of the other House. The people do not select the postmaster under the present system. Under the present system there is a struggle of factions in a town or city, and then the postmaster is appointed on the recommendation of the member of the House of Representatives, with the indorsement, perhaps, of the Senator. That is the way postmasters are now selected. We all know it; we have all done it; and we might as well be honest about it and not talk about the people being so much injured by our giving up something which we have ourselves.

I do not in the least undertake to put forward any superior claim to virtue in this respect for myself or anybody else who thinks as I do in regard to this amendment. I have recommended men for post-offices when I was in the other House, and I have no doubt I shall do so again; but when I do it and recommend a postmaster for appointment to office, I am not going to get up in the Senate and object to having that patronage taken from me on the pretense that the people are going to be interfered with. The only persons who will be interfered with by a consolidation of offices are those who now have the gift of those offices, and those persons are the members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate. I do not think that patronage belonging to the Senate or the other House ought to stand in the way of the proper administration of the postal service of the Government. It is a great business service; it comes home closer to the people than any other part of the Government service. You may be perfectly certain that if the people get bad service through consolidated offices they will remonstrate and they will bring it to an end.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is it not their habit now under the present system to remonstrate against bad service?

Mr. LODGE. I did not say it was not.

Mr. HAWLEY. What is the difference?

Mr. LODGE. The argument I am trying to meet is that this amendment is taking from the people something which belongs to them. I say it takes from them nothing whatever. It takes away from Senators and Members of Congress a certain amount of patronage and kills it; but that is not taking anything from the people. The people are not going to submit to a bad service under a consolidated district any more than they will submit to bad service very long from a fourth-class postmaster. They mean to have good service; and if they have a good office, well managed, well lighted, with a civil clerk and a civil postmaster, that contents them, as the Senator from Colorado said. That is what they want. They are not worrying as to whether the friend of some Representative or Senator has got the place or whether he is a Democrat or Republican. They want to get their letters, and they want to get them in the best way. They want to get as many deliveries as they can have and as many mails as they can have. Those are the wishes of the people; and they are troubling their heads very little about how many offices members of the other House and Senators may have to dispose of.

In the few words I said about this amendment when it first came up I did not undertake to argue it on civil-service grounds, because I am sorry to say that I think that is only a very small part of it. It does not seem to me to go very far in that direction. I wish it went much further. Incidentally it takes a few offices out of the present system and puts them into another, which I think is an excellent thing.

But the great argument for it is that it is going to give us a better and more economical postal service. Five hundred thousand dollars can be saved in one year. That is admitted by the Committee on Appropriations, and yet better service be given. There is no need of conjuring up bugbears or seizing in imagination whole States and wiping out all the delightful and delectable country post-offices in order to interfere with and stop a measure of economy and good sense.

Whether the amendment carries or not, attention has been called to it, and I think Senators will find that what the people really want is the best possible postal service, and that this amendment helps in that direction. They want the greatest economy, because economy in the postal service means in a very short time cheaper letter postage to them; and if we keep or make a more expensive system, we simply deprive the people of the advantages which they ought to have and will ultimately get. If they do not get this reform this year they will get it later. You can no more put back the wheels of progress in a thing like this—a pure question of intelligent business management—than you can put back the course of human invention or human enterprise.

It has been intimated that there was politics in this. I can not conceive how there should be any politics in it. This is the scheme of a Democratic Postmaster-General. I think it carries out the principles which have been advocated by Postmasters-General of both parties. It certainly has been advocated on this floor by a former Democratic Postmaster-General—the one man here who, by actual experience, knows more about the administration of the post-office than all the other members of the Senate put together, because he had to run it and knows exactly what it is. We have, in fact, the opinion of every man who has been charged with the duty of postal administration in favor of the principle of this amendment.

The present Postmaster-General is not of my party. I disagree with his policy in regard to the tariff, for instance, as widely as one man can differ from another, but that does not prevent me from realizing and saying that he has made an excellent Postmaster-General, and that when he proposes an improvement it ought to be passed, and that his support gives great weight to the argument. I can not for the life of me see any politics concealed in this thing anywhere. It seems to me purely a case of improved administration. That is the reason I introduced the amendment; that is the ground on which it has been advocated by the Senator from Colorado and myself, and that is the reason why I hope it will be adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate in regard to the insurrection in Cuba.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 941) granting to the Atchison and Nebraska Railroad Company and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, its lessee in perpetuity, the right of way over a part of the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian reservations in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 163) to amend the act approved August 1, 1894, making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, etc.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 25,000 additional copies of Bureau of Education Circular of Information, No. 200, Catalogue of the American Literary Association Library; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 2,500 copies of Commercial Relations for 1894 and 1895, and 10,000 copies of the Review of the World's Commerce, etc.; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 300 copies of the Proceedings of the Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam Vessels for the years 1895 and 1896; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

NANCY G. ALLABACH.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 894) granting a pension to Nancy G. Allabach, which was, in line 9, after the word "month," to insert "in lieu of that she is now receiving."

Mr. PALMER. That is an unimportant amendment and I move that the Senate concur in it.

The amendment was concurred in.

PROCEEDINGS OF BOARD OF INSPECTORS OF STEAM VESSELS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Treasury Department, Steamboat Inspection Service, 300 copies each of the Proceedings of the Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam Vessels for the years 1895 and 1896.

CATALOGUE OF AMERICAN LITERARY ASSOCIATION LIBRARY.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to present a conference report, which will take but a moment. No action is required upon it, the other House having receded from its action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate concurrent resolution No. 19, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment to the Senate concurrent resolution and agree to the same.

JOHN SHERMAN,
JOHN T. MORGAN,
H. C. LODGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

ROBERT R. HITT,
ROBERT ADAMS, JR.,
JAMES B. MCCREARY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that no action is required on the report.

Mr. ALLISON. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the report as it appears upon the Secretary's desk. Of course, the ordinary procedure would have been for the House of Representatives to have receded from its disagreement to our resolution and agree to it, but the report, as it appears on the Secretary's table, simply says that the House of Representatives agree to the conference report. I do not know what the Journal of the other House may show, but that Journal certainly ought to show that they have agreed to the resolution of the Senate. The report does not show it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the action of the House. I do not know how the report is worded.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the report be read again.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us again hear the conference report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be again read.

The Secretary again read the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HARRIS. That covers the whole case.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the message be read which was just laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 6, 1896.

Resolved, That the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the concurrent resolution of the Senate in regard to the insurrection in Cuba.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] would know whether that is sufficient. I think it covers the whole ground.

Mr. HARRIS. I think clearly the House of Representatives recedes from its disagreement to the Senate resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. The House does not say so.

Mr. ALLISON. The message does not show that; and that is the point I am making.

Mr. LODGE. The report of the conferees shows it.

Mr. ALLISON. That is not the report submitted to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I think it does clearly show that the other House has agreed to the Senate resolution, receding from its amendment to that resolution. If the report shows anything, it shows that unquestionably, as it seems to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I am told that the report was agreed to by a majority of 244 to 27.

Mr. ALLISON. As a matter of fact, the committee of conference did not need to make a report in this case. Whenever the other House agreed to recede from its disagreement to our resolution that settled the whole question. The conferees have made a report. That report has gone to the other House, and the report here at our Secretary's desk says that that House have agreed to it. It does not show, and they have not reported to us, that they have receded from their disagreement to the Senate resolution and have agreed to it. That is the point I make.

Mr. SHERMAN. They have agreed to the conference report, which shows that the House have receded from their disagreement to the Senate resolutions.

Mr. ALLISON. I defer to the Senator from Ohio. I assume for myself, at least, that the House of Representatives have not in form receded from their amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks no action is required upon the report.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the discussion of the pending amendment which took place on Thursday last and which has taken place so far to-day is a revelation to me. I have learned from the remarks of the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], and also of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that we have had in this country since its organization a tyrannical system of administering the affairs of the Post-Office Department. I believe the people of the United States will be deeply interested in reading the discussion of Thursday last and in reading that portion of the discussion of to-day which has taken place up to this hour. I turn to page 3483 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Thursday last, when this question was under discussion, where I interrupted the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and put him this question:

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator how far can the Postmaster-General, through the postmaster, for instance, in Baltimore, extend these substations?—

Speaking at that time of the substations around the city of Baltimore—

Mr. GORMAN. I have no doubt he may embrace the whole State of Maryland.

Mr. ALLEN. Over a hundred miles?

Mr. GORMAN. There is no limit except the amount of money at his disposal.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the postmaster at Baltimore would be practically the postmaster of Maryland?

Mr. GORMAN. He would be, and it would be the same in any other State. There is absolutely no limit except as to the amount of money.

Further along in the discussion the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] used this language:

Mr. President, my understanding, unfortunately, is that the effect of this amendment is not to enlarge the power of the Postmaster-General in the application of the fund. I should be very glad if it did. I understand—I should be glad to have the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations correct me if I am wrong, as I am very apt to be [laughter]—that the effect of this amendment is simply to declare the opinion of Congress that it recognizes the right of the Postmaster-General to so distribute, coalesce, and consolidate these offices as the public business shall require. The necessary effect will be at a subsequent Congress that the necessary appropriations will be changed from such sums as are applicable to fourth-class postmasters, so that they will be gradually applied, as necessity may require, to the payment of clerks. I take it that that will be so. I should be very glad if this amendment did enlarge the powers of the Postmaster-General; but I do not see that it does, and I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to tell me if it does.

Later in the discussion I had the honor to interrupt the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], who was discussing this matter, in the following language:

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question or two which I regard as very important. Do I understand that as the law exists now and as it is proposed to perfect it the Postmaster-General may, for instance, say that a post-office 50 miles from the city of Omaha in the country shall be a subpost-office of Omaha?

Mr. VILAS. The law as it stands now gives the Postmaster-General power to establish or discontinue a post-office at pleasure. It gives him power to establish substations within any post-office district, and it is within his power to define what the post-office district shall be.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I understand the Senator to assert this——

Mr. VILAS. But I wish to add that it is not to be presumed that a law which has existed like that since the beginning of the Government, since the establishment of the Post-Office Department under Benjamin Franklin, is to be abused as is indicated by that question.

Mr. ALLEN. But I do not understand that since the time of Benjamin Franklin the law has existsd to establish subpost-offices. I understand that the power to establish or abolish a post-office exists, but what I want to know of the Senator——

Mr. VILAS. It has existed since the system was begun.

Mr. ALLEN. What I want to know of the Senator is how long there has been a law upon our statute books that would authorize the postmaster of the city of Baltimore, for instance, to create subpost-offices beyond the corporate limits of that city?

Mr. VILAS. I think since the system was originally devised.

Mr. ALLEN. Since the system was originally devised?

Mr. VILAS. Yes. The law now directs, and always has directed, everything within the postal service to be done by the Postmaster-General. The law says the Postmaster-General shall stamp and back stamp letters. The Postmaster-General carries the mail. The Postmaster-General does everything. Congress simply provides him with authority to employ means to do it. Originally postmasters were known as and called deputy postmasters, because they were the deputies only of the Postmaster-General. The phrase "deputy" was afterwards dropped.

Mr. ALLEN. The question I put to the Senator, which he does not answer—at least I have not heard his answer—is, how long has the Postmaster-General had the right, for instance, to create a subpost-office to the main post-office of the city of Baltimore beyond the corporate limits of the city of Baltimore?

Mr. LODGE. He has always had it.

Mr. VILAS. I think he has enjoyed the same right that he now has since the Government of the United States was instituted and the Post-Office Department was established, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. LODGE. He has always had it.

Mr. VILAS. He has always had it.

Mr. ALLEN. How long has the system of substations been in existence?

Mr. VILAS. A very great many years. I can not undertake to tell the Senator when the first substation was established. Probably it was in the city of New York. But it must be understood that there is a vast difference in the character and classes of substations. The Postmaster-General now has in the city of New York, etc.

Further along there occurred the following colloquy:

Mr. ALLEN. If the position of the Senator from Wisconsin is correct, what is there to prevent the Postmaster-General from making, for instance, a post-office 400 miles across the entire width of the State of Nebraska a substation of the post-office at Omaha?

Mr. VILAS. We do not as a rule have Postmasters-General made of that stuff.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask what is there in the laws to prevent it?

Mr. VILAS. There is nothing in the law to prevent it.

So the discussion runs on over several pages of the RECORD of Thursday last, revealing what is to me at least the astounding fact that the Postmaster-General from the organization of the Government has been a supreme and unlimited dictator in the administration of the affairs of that Department. The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] seemed to think it was something peculiar that a man should show any ignorance upon the subject. Of course the senior Senator from Wisconsin, having himself at one time occupied the important position of Postmaster-General, is entirely familiar with the laws governing that Department. I take it he states the law as it exists when he says there never has been a time when the Postmaster-General could not abolish or establish an office at any place in the United States where he might see fit, and that there has never been a time when the Postmaster-General could not take a post-office removed three or four or five hundred miles from a given post-office and make it the substation of that office. In fact, the Senator in the discussion on Thursday last stated that he could do so with an office a thousand miles distant, or any distance. I think I can find the remark, and I shall find it before the discussion is over.

Now, what is proposed? Is it proposed to limit the power of the Postmaster-General, whose power is plenary, unrestrained? No, sir. It is proposed to enlarge it if it were possible to enlarge unrestrained power. The Postmaster-General is to have the power to absorb all the little post-offices in a State or in two or three States and make them subpost-offices of some central point, and by that means make them all tributary to a central point. Why should that be done? Why does the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] or the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] ask the Senate to adopt this amendment? They say to us that it is in the interest of civil-service reform, and that we will get better service from it; that it is proper to put all those offices in the classified service, because thereby the people of this country will obtain for less money better service than they now enjoy.

There has not been one word said here, there has not been a fact adduced in the discussion, showing that the service would be improved. It is true we have heard the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] so argue, but not one fact has been adduced by any of those gentlemen to prove that the service as it now exists would be improved by enlarging the powers of the Postmaster-General or by giving him power to absorb all these offices.

Then, what is the purpose of the amendment? The honorable Senator from Colorado and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts say that there is nothing of sentiment in this matter; that it is a mere business transaction. There is something of sentiment in it. There is a great deal of sentiment in it. We are told by the advocates of civil-service reform that a republican form of government upon this continent is a failure, for that is what it means. Why not continue the system as it is? Why have a man who wants a fourth-class post-office answer 400 or 500 questions that may be put to him by some boy who is just out of his knickerbockers and who has recently left the graduating class of a high school? Why not continue the service as it is? Certainly there is no complaint coming from any responsible source that the little fourth-class post-offices are not properly administered. It is just and right that this power should be diffused among the people, and among all classes of people, so far as it can be done.

We are told that the boy who graduates from school to-day, under better advantages than his father enjoyed, by force of that fact is more clearly eligible to the service of his country than is his father, and the father who did not enjoy those opportunities and who can not answer the questions which a few gentlemen put to him is by virtue of that fact denied the privilege of entering the civil service of his country. Senators say that the people do not complain. They do complain. If the question were to-day put to the people of this country by a popular vote whether substations should be created and clerks sent to them from a distant part of the country to administer them, for instance, in a neighborhood where some old man has administered the office for ten, fifteen, or twenty years, the vote would be almost unanimous against the adoption of the system. The people look upon those offices as theirs, and they are theirs. Sir, the people of this country are supreme. They are supreme in electing everybody from the roadmaster of an obscure road to the present occupant of the White House, and anything that looks like absorbing power, anything that looks like taking power from the people, is wrong. It is not only not democratic or republican, but it is not American.

How much education must a man in this country have to run a fourth-class post-office which has a salary of one hundred, or two hundred, or five hundred dollars attached to it? With some of us it was a misfortune that we did not enjoy an opportunity to procure an education. We were not to blame for it. I remember distinctly when my education began in a log schoolhouse in the State of Ohio, where I was born, and when I graduated from a sod schoolhouse in the State of Iowa, to which I had removed. I had no opportunity to procure a more complete technical school education. I had not the means to procure such an education if the opportunity had otherwise been presented. Yet millions of citizens of this country who were born in or who in early manhood went to the great West and Southwest are, under this system of classification, to be deprived of their interest in the Government, and of the right to participate in the administration of the affairs of this and other Departments of the Government in consequence of a lack of a perfect technical school education.

Mr. President, I venture the statement that there is not a Senator in this Chamber who, without some preparation, can go down to the Civil Service Commissioner's office and pass an examination in any classified department. Necessarily the man or the boy who is freshest from the books passes the most creditable examination. Yet all of the men who, under the rule laid down by the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Massachusetts, are deprived of the right to participate in the affairs of this Government in holding these little offices and in holding little offices in other departments of the Government have a right to vote as American citizens. They have a right to choose other officers. They have a right to choose the very officers who appoint the Civil Service Commissioners, as well as those who create the law authorizing the existence of such a commission. Yet because they do not pass a particular examination or answer correctly a certain percentage of questions which may be put to them by the examiners under the civil service, they are rendered ineligible to hold the position of postmaster of a fourth-class post-office.

Senators say that the people have no interest in this matter. There are hundreds and thousands and tens of thousands of little towns scattered through the country where the post-office is the place at which the men of the neighborhood meet to discuss political and other questions. It is an important matter to them to have a man chosen from the community with whom they are acquainted and who will be responsible to them for the administration of the affairs of the office. Does the honorable Senator from Colorado believe, does any candid man believe, that a man sent into that community from another community to hold this little office and administer its affairs can be in sympathy with the people who reside there? Not at all. He is not answerable to the people. He is answerable alone to some postmaster situated three or four hundred miles from the office or the substation he occupies. Would not appeals from the people of that community fall upon deaf ears if they should complain of the manner in which that man administered the affairs of his office?

Sir, he may not be a voter in the community. He may not have reached the years at which he is eligible to vote. He is not a taxpayer. He does not participate in the affairs of the community. He is not responsible to the people of the community, and therefore he has no sympathy with them and gives ear to no grievance which they may lay before him or before the office to which his station is tributary. But what can he do? He will carry out the behest of the man who appoints him in working political schemes in that neighborhood. It is the most gigantic attempt ever made in this country to control the political affairs of the nation. Here is an army of 150,000 men responsible, not to the communities in which they discharge their duties, but to some central point, who are not in sympathy with those communities, who are there for the purpose of working in the interest of a particular political party or organization which they represent.

The Civil Service Commissioners tell us that the appointees are not to take any part in politics. There was an illustration of that under the Administration of Mr. Hayes, I think. The very first order that was issued by the late President Hayes was his celebrated Order No. 1. Under it no man holding an office was permitted to go to a convention or a caucus and participate in the affairs of the community or locality or State in which he resided. Was it observed? Were not those who advocate the system of civil-service reform, as they call it, the first to trample down Order No. 1 of President Hayes? Was it not openly violated and flagrantly abused by them from that time on? So strong was the protest of the Republican party against the issue of the order that there was not the slightest attempt to carry it into execution, and the old order of rewarding those who worked during the heat and burden of the day in the campaign was reinstated, and, Mr. President, it is in practice in this Government to-day, notwithstanding the sham pretense of civil-service reform.

How was it under a Democratic Administration? The great Mugwump of this country to-day is installed in the White House. It is very difficult to tell whether Mr. Cleveland is more Mugwump than he is imperial Democrat, but certainly he has led the hosts of Mugwumps in this country for the last ten or fifteen years. Has it not been a common thing under the present Administration to remove for political causes men who were holding positions under the so-called civil-service reform? What became of Mr. Johnston, a member of that Commission, two years ago? I refer to George D. Johnston, of Louisiana. He had the temerity to disagree with Teddy Roosevelt, the great New York Mugwump, second only to Cleveland himself. He did not agree with him as to the administration of some of the affairs of that office. Mr. Johnston seems to have been an honest reformer. It did not seem to have dawned upon his mind until about the time he was removed that civil-service reform was an absolute sham; a sham, Mr. President, under which dishonest men undertake to work political ends and then claim great virtue for having done so.

Mr. Johnston disagreed with his associates, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Lyman. Immediately he was removed. The President of the United States could not even suffer this Commissioner to entertain an independent opinion. We are told that this system is desired so that men can be free from annoyance for expressing their opinions upon political questions; that it shall be nonpartisan; that a man, if he is a Republican and well qualified, can hold his office through a Democratic Administration, and that a Democrat who is well qualified can hold his office through a Republican Administration. Yet when one of those Commissioners at the head of this branch of the service disagreed with his associates and seemed to block the way of carrying out political schemes and purposes in the Commission itself; when he seemed to think that the law was an honest law and should be honestly administered, suddenly he found the President calling for his resignation, and offering to transfer him to a different line of the public service.

I wish to call attention to some letters which appeared in the press some time ago:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, November 25, 1893.

DEAR SIR: I am sorry to hear through your friends, Senator CAFFERY and Mr. Secretary Herbert, who conveyed to you my request that you acquiesce in your transfer from the Civil Service Commission to another post of honorable duty, that you decline the proposition and refuse to resign your present position. I am so certain that the public good requires a change in the Commission, involving your retirement, that I am constrained to request you to reconsider your decision and put me in possession of your resignation as early as Monday afternoon, the 27th instant, at 4 o'clock.

Yours, very truly,

GROVER CLEVELAND.

Hon. GEORGE D. JOHNSTON.

The world, however, has remained in ignorance of the good that the public service would derive by the transfer of Mr. Johnston from the Civil Service Commission to the consular service of the Government. What had Mr. Johnston done? Had he been guilty of violating any statute? Had he said or done anything that was not proper for him to say or do? No. He had simply seen fit to enter a dissenting opinion upon some question of legal construction entertained by his associates, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Lyman. The President might as well say to a man whom he is about to appoint a justice of the Supreme Court, "I have appointed a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States who believes that every corporation has wings, who believes that corporations have all the rights and the people have none. Now, I appoint you as an associate justice upon that bench; but, mark you, whenever you manifest any independence of opinion or character or disagree with the Chief Justice you will be removed." Here were three commissioners appointed with coordinate powers, the office of one as high as the office of the other, and yet because Mr. Johnston saw fit in the exercise of an honest conviction to disagree with his associates he was removed for the good of the public service from that Commission and was to be transferred to the consular service. But where did he go? He went where all such men go under this Administration.

Now, Mr. Johnston replied to this letter, and he replied in perfectly polite language. He wrote under date of "Washington, November 27, 1893," two days later, and said:

The PRESIDENT.

SIR: Your letter of the 26th instant is received. Senator CAFFERY and Mr. Secretary Herbert conveyed to me your offer of the consulship at Victoria, which meant, of course, that you propose to retire me from the Civil Service Commission—

The President was ready to dicker with him; he was ready to transfer him to the consulship at Victoria if he could only get rid of him, get him off of the Civil Service Commission and give his henchmen a full opportunity at that tribunal—

You did not communicate to me through these gentlemen your reasons for my retirement, nor have you ever spoken to me in regard to this or any other matter connected with the discharge of my duties, or relating to the Commission or its work. Though conscious of having discharged the duties of my office faithfully, and, as I believe, in furtherance of the best interests of the people and the Government, I would promptly acquiesce in your wish that I resign had you given me an opportunity to be heard before you decided upon your action. Under present circumstances, however, I can not, consistently with my sense of duty to myself or my friends who recommended my appointment, consent either to resign or accept a position inferior to the one I now hold.

Respectfully, GEORGE D. JOHNSTON.

Mr. Johnston had not been informed of the charge made against him. He had not been called to the White House and given an opportunity to explain anything. He had been the victim of a star-chamber judgment upon the part of the Chief Executive of this nation. He was not even permitted to go before some person representing the President and lay his cause before him. I suppose that is Democracy according to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. President, without knowing the charge against him, and being ignorant of the charge against him to this day, for that matter, as I am informed, except that he disagreed in the construction of a statute from his associate Commissioners, this man was removed after the President could not purchase him and dispose of him by sending him as consul to Victoria. Then his majesty—or his excellency, I should say—sent the following letter to Mr. Johnston:

Hon. GEORGE D. JOHNSTON.

SIR—

He ceased to be "Dear sir." In the first letter it was "Hon. George D. Johnston, dear sir," an affectionate sort of a letter, but when informed that Mr. Johnston would not resign and could not be bought—for that is what he undertook to do with him—the President for the first time shows his hand in the cold and stereotyped expression, "Sir"—

Hon. GEORGE D. JOHNSTON.

SIR: You are hereby removed from the office of United States Civil Service Commissioner.

Yours, truly, GROVER CLEVELAND.

For what cause was he removed? Why was this man, who was at the head of the Civil Service Commission of the United States, taken, so to speak, by the nape of the neck and thrown out of office without a charge being made against him, without being given an opportunity to be heard in his defense? Will the President of the United States hear a charge that involves the character, the integrity, or the manhood of a public officer and not give that officer an opportunity to explain it or to be heard upon it? If he will do that, Mr. President, then he is a disgrace to the great office he occupies, and he should not be returned, as he doubtless will not be returned, to that position.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to make an inquiry, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator himself know what was the alleged cause of Mr. Johnston's removal?

Mr. ALLEN. I can not give it in detail. I read it at the time and I have read it since, but it is not important here. That is not the question I am discussing. I have discussed the action of a man who will pursue the tactics that were pursued in the days of Jeffreys and the Old Bailey, a man who will hear whisperings and charges against the character or against the fitness of a man holding a public position and remove him without giving him an opportunity to be heard in his defense. Then Mr. Johnston acknowledged the receipt of the letter of removal, as follows:

The PRESIDENT.

SIR: Your note of this date informing me that you have removed me from the office of United States Civil Service Commissioner is hereby acknowledged.

Respectfully, GEORGE D. JOHNSTON.

And Mr. Johnston passed from an important office in this country, with headquarters in this city, into private life, not knowing the accusation made against him except that he had disagreed with his associates in some respects.

Now, Mr. President, this is civil service. What is to be gained by the introduction of such a system of civil service when it is rotten at the very fountain source, when it is used by the Chief Executive, when it is used by his Cabinet officers, as a mere cloak to the accomplishment of their political and personal desires and purposes? There may be a few persons in this country who are gullible enough to think that this is a wonderful scheme for renovating offices, putting competent men at the head of affairs, reducing the crimes in offices and the cost of their administration. There may be a few such people, I say, but there are not many. There are but few of the people of the United States who do not know to-day that the so-called civil-service reform is a snare, a fraud, and a delusion, and that it is made to work out political purposes as much now as the old system did before the introduction of the present system.

Mr. President, if the Senators who advocate this measure are to be believed, every man who enters the classified service is a saint; there is some peculiarity in the blood that courses through his veins; and every man who is not eligible to it is by force of that fact dishonest or unfit to be considered as a citizen of the United States, or he is a mere groundling with water coursing through his veins instead of blood. It counts for nothing that the Revolutionary fathers established this Government for all, not alone for the educated man, but in the interest of the man who was not educated. It matters not to the distinguished Senator from Colorado or the Senator from Massachusetts that those men spilled their blood from Concord to Yorktown in rescuing our country from the yoke of English oppression.

It matters not that their descendants from that time to this have upheld the flag of this country in every great struggle we have had for the maintenance of our Government and the maintenance of our freedom. After this country has been brought in safety to its present position we are to have this un-Democratic, un-Republican, un-Populistic, un-American distinction introduced into our service that the man who spells "copy" with one "p" is to have an office against another fellow who was taught forty years ago to spell it with two "p's." That is the distinction. That is the crown of the distinction. And a lot of men, boys from school, who have never done anything in defense of their country, who might prove the most impotent of all if called upon to discharge any great public service in the hour of danger, are to be enthroned in the most important offices of the country, and the old men and the old women, the middle-aged men and the middle-aged women, who did not enjoy equal opportunities of education with them, are to be placed in the background.

Now, what can be accomplished by the scheme before us? We are told that there are something like 150,000 persons in the mail service of this country. I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin if I am right.

Mr. VILAS. About that number.

Mr. ALLEN. How are they to be used? They are to be nonpartisan. Mr. President, you and I know how this nonpartisan civil service works. You know, and so does the Senator from Wisconsin, what would be the result if the postmaster at Milwaukee, for instance, should say to the clerk who is holding a subpost-office 50 miles from there: "See the people in your community and get as many of them to go to the Democratic caucus as you can and support the good old party."

Mr. President, do you suppose that clerk would refuse to carry into execution the order? Suppose it were not placed as an argument, but said to him, "Now, would it not be a pretty good plan for you to see some of the old men in the communities where your subagents are and see if you can not induce them to go to the town caucuses and get on the delegations from the towns to the county conventions," do you not suppose the clerks would carry into execution the request and wishes of their master? Sir, the clerk does it to-day in the classified service and out of it, and if in the classified service he is not answerable to the people upon whom he would commit and does commit such an outrage.

Mr. President, it has been a common thing since I have been a member of this body to have employees in the Departments in this city come to me (I am not at liberty to call their names, nor am I at liberty to speak as plainly as I should upon the subject for fear that some Civil Service Commissioner or his agent may be around and chase them down and chase them out of their offices) and say that they had risen under the civil service from a six or eight hundred dollar job a year up to $1,800, and sometimes as high as $2,000 or more, and they had been in the service for years.

When Mr. Harrison went out and Mr. Cleveland came into power they were told that they would have to take a reduced position. I will venture the remark that 50 per cent of the Republicans that are in appointive positions in this city to-day have been reduced from the position they occupied when Harrison went out of the White House and Cleveland went in. They were told that they must take a reduced position, and some Democrat in the same service, who came in later than they did, or who has been appointed to the service since the present Administration, was promoted above them.

I could call the names and the offices this moment if I were permitted to do so, but the interests of those persons will not permit me. I have known a few instances where the occupants of the office thought the law was passed to be observed, where they had not discovered that it was a mere cloak under which political parties were masking their purposes. I recall an instance right now where a man had been in the service for over ten years in one of the Departments in this city. I have known the man personally for twenty-five years—a thoroughly competent, honest, and well-equipped man.

Within a short time after Mr. Cleveland came into power in 1893 it was indicated to this gentleman that he must take a reduced position at $1,200 a year, as the chief of the bureau wanted his place for a Democrat. He rebelled. Did not the statute say, does not the President say, do not the Civil Service Commissioners say, do not the Mugwumps say as well, that a man in such a position can not be removed for political causes, that if he is a gentleman and qualified and in the classified service he can remain whether he is a Democrat or a Republican? They all said this, the law said this, and the man construed the statute and he construed their words to be honest and as showing the evident purpose of the framers of the statute. When he informed the chief of the bureau under whose charge he was that he could not take the reduced position, the chief of the bureau said to him, "Well, you will have to resign, because I want your office for a good Democrat here." He did not resign; the chief could not get rid of him that way; but finally he did get rid of him by abolishing the office.

You know we permit these Departments to establish a limitless number of offices and fill them. The office was abolished. Then the victim of civil-service reform discovered for the first time that it was a delusion and a snare, and he went out into the cold, chilly atmosphere of the world to struggle for himself, and he is down along the cool waters of Babylon, I presume, at this moment. Now, what was the result? The Republican had not left that office three weeks until the office was created again, and it was filled by the Democrat who sought it.

Mr. President, I speak of this not as an isolated case. Cases can be found by the hundreds right in this city and in other cities and centers of population in this country. Yet Senators will stand in this Chamber and advocate the adoption and enforcement of this iniquitous system of doing business. They will say, notwithstanding this, that the great body of the American people should be shut out of holding these little offices that are scattered throughout the States and Territories of the Union. Why, Mr. President, what would you do with one of the little fellows who had been reared in the civil service and who could not tell a horse from an ox except that the one has horns and the other has not? What would you do with such a person as that, who feels himself above all responsibility in a moral, a social, and a business sense to the people whose office he administers, in putting him out at some country crossroad store to administer the mail service, at a salary of $100 or $200 a year, for the people who congregate there, when some young man living in the community who has a little store and carries on a little business can administer the affairs of that office in the interest of the people who live around it and who are tributary to it? Under the system advocated by these gentlemen a man might be sent a distance of 100 or 500 or 1,000 miles to administer one of these offices and the people of the community where he went be given to understand that he was sent there because there could not be found in that community a man who had intelligence enough to discharge the duties required of a little fourth-class postmaster.

But the Senator from Wisconsin says this is Democratic. I think I heard him say on Thursday last that this is Democratic, and the Senator says now that it is Democratic. Well, Mr. President, it may be Democratic. I do not know; I would not say that it was not modern Democracy. It is certainly not ancient Democracy. What did the fathers of the Democratic party teach in this country? They said liberty was most secure when the power of administering the affairs of the Government ramified all communities and was held in the hands of the common people. I suppose after a while we shall be carrying the rules of civil-service reform into the New England town meetings, and the junior Senator from Massachusetts will tell the people of that Commonwealth that it is necessary for the efficient administration of the public service in these communities that only the highly educated classes shall be permitted to levy the taxes and discharge the various duties devolving upon town offices.

This spirit has run wild; it has gone to the very verge of idiocy; it stands stamped with the condemnation, in my judgment, of every man who is a true friend of this country, of every man who does not want to erect upon this continent a ruling class and a class to be ruled. I imagine it would be a remarkable scene, if it could be so, to witness the senior Senator from Wisconsin discussing this question with the illustrious Jefferson. I imagine if Mr. Jefferson could rise from his grave to-day and walk into the Senate Chamber and hear the Senator from Wisconsin declare that this is Democratic doctrine, he would believe that his great rival, Hamilton, or the descendants of Hamilton, had come into control of the Government. Jefferson did not believe this doctrine; it was not even believed in by the most radical men of that age.

Mr. President, it proves another thing. There is no difference between Cleveland Democracy and gold-bug Republicanism. I classify gold-bug Republicanism because it leads to many other heresies, but that is the chief one. What distinction is there between the opinion of the junior Senator from Colorado or the junior Senator from Massachusetts and the illustrious Senator from Wisconsin upon this subject? They are glad to embrace, so says the junior Senator from Massachusetts, and he walks over toward the senior Senator from Wisconsin as though he were going to embrace him on this subject; he is glad to agree with him upon this great, supreme proposition of the hour, civil-service reform. There is not the slightest distinction between them upon any other great political question now agitating the country. They are simply agreed upon these great propositions, except that the senior Senator from Wisconsin is on the Democratic stage driving the team, and the Senator from Massachusetts is on the Republican stage driving a like team. They are in perfect harmony, in perfect accord upon this, as well as upon other great political questions which are now agitating the people.

Of course, Mr. President, men like myself are away behind. We have not had the opportunities of seeing the beauties of civil-service reform as administered under the Administration of Mr. Cleveland and under the Administration of Mr. Harrison. We are not supposed to have cultivated taste enough to appreciate it if we came in close contact with it. The great masses of the people are supposed, according to this system, to be absolutely incapable of conducting their own affairs. When you say that that distinction shall be erected, that it shall be incorporated into our laws and applied, do you not say to the great majority of the people of this country that they are incapable of self-government and that self-government is a failure?

You say to these men, "Yes, you can pay taxes, that is all right; you can support the Government in discharging your duties as a citizen in the payment of taxes; you can support the Government by discharging your duty as a juror when called into court, in determining great questions that are submitted to you; you can support your Government by taking your musket and joining the Army and fighting your country's battles, if you will; you do not have to spell very well when you do that; no, you are a good citizen when you do that; you can fight in defense of your country; you may stand by its flag on fifty occasions when it is imperiled and endangered by its enemies. All these as a citizen of this country you can and must do; but when you come home you find the dudes intrenched in the civil service, and if you fail to pass an examination such as is described in this book [indicating], you can get nothing out of this Government, not even a fourth-class postoffice." We who do not believe in this are told that we are not æsthetic, that we do not rise to that high, keen intellectual appreciation of how this great Government should be run by the few and the masses excluded from any responsibility.

There is nothing political in it; of course not. You let Mr. Wilson, the present Postmaster-General, have all these great offices, some 68,000, I think, consolidated with your substations at 40 or 50 different points in the United States, with a superintendent over every division, and every postmaster or clerk in every division will be throwing up his hat for the Democratic party this year, or, if he does not, his office will be abolished, and after a while the office will be restored and a Democrat put in his place.

Mr. President, I recall a year ago last fall, in 1894—and I am speaking now of the bond of sympathy which exists between Democrats and Republicans here—the great contest for the office of governor in my State, where the present chief executive, a Populist, was finally elected by 3,100 majority over his Republican competitor. When the news first came to the centers of population in that State, it was that his Republican competitor had been elected. Every Cleveland Democrat in the State of Nebraska supported the Republican candidate for governor, every man who believed in the gold standard, every man who wore a collar round his neck labeled "My dog," every Government official walked to the ballot box and cast his vote for the Republican candidate for governor. When the news came that he was elected—it was a mistake, however—there were a dozen or more places in the State of Nebraska where the postmasters walked into the streets, threw their hats into the air, and almost split their lungs in cheering for the supposed triumphant election of the Republican candidate for governor. It was only two or three days after that when they discovered their mistake and found that the Populist had slipped through and that the Republican had not succeeded.

What difference is there between these parties? I say, Mr. President, that the gold wing, the Cleveland element of the Democratic party of the State of Nebraska, has supported the Republican ticket for the last seven or eight years in that State. So it has been in other sections of the country. Those gentlemen who are solidified upon this question and upon other questions would rather see a certain element of the Republican party win, or a certain element of the Republican party would rather see a certain other element of the Democratic party win, than to see any person win who is in full accord and sympathy with the masses all the time.

Mr. President, this is not a question of sentiment, these gentlemen say; it is a question of efficiency of the service. I say it is a question of sentiment to a certain extent. There is nothing to which the people of this country are more securely attached, especially in the rural districts, than to the postmaster and the administration of the little post-offices in which they feel a personal interest, a place where they can congregate and get their mail; where they can exchange ideas upon neighborhood and other subjects, if they see fit. To send a stranger among them, who is not of them or for them, who does not pay a cent of taxes in the community where he has been sent, who is not a part and parcel of their organization, and not eligible to any other office there, would be like sending a man from Russia or from some distant country into their midst to administer the affairs of their community.

The process has begun; the process of absorption has already taken place. In the last fiscal year the number of post-offices discontinued by order of the Postmaster-General was 94; the number of stations established in lieu of the 94 independent post-offices was 74, of the carrier stations 20, and the substations 54. How long will it take under this system until all the principal States of this Union will be affected by this process of absorption?

Then, Mr. President, these gentlemen are not contented with turning over the entire Post-Office Department to so-called civil-service reform, but it will appear from this bill that they are going into partnership with the manufacturers of bicycles. We have suffered every trust in this country to organize with impunity that wanted to do so without restraint. Notwithstanding we have statutes containing ample provisions against the formation of trusts of various kinds, we sit here powerless, and the different branches of the Government sit here powerless to enforce these statutes, or refuse absolutely to enforce them, in many instances refusing to enforce the statutes against these trusts because they are depending upon the trusts for a campaign fund to conduct the Presidential and other important campaigns of this country. I heard it charged openly but a short time ago that $300,000 was raised by certain parties in Wall street, New York, for the nomination of Mr. Cleveland for the Presidency in 1892, and that the same identical individuals raised a like sum to secure the nomination of Mr. Harrison as the Republican nominee in the same year. The statement was made in the presence of some gentlemen who sit here at this time and who ought to know, and it was not denied, and if there is any denial to be made to it I am perfectly willing that it should be made now.

Mr. GRAY. Were not some such charges made against Mr. McKinley?

Mr. ALLEN. I have not read the latest evidence upon the McKinley case. I have the primary evidence, however, in my desk here, which I shall use at the proper time.

It was charged, furthermore, that up to four weeks before the election of 1892 these gentlemen in Wall street, who manipulate the affairs of this country, and all of whom are civil-service reformers, of course, did not know whether they would support Mr. Cleveland or support Mr. Harrison. Their affection was divided. Of course the average Wall street shark has nothing like patriotism about him. It is only a question, as has been said, of cent per cent with them; a question as to whom they can control and manipulate to the best advantage. So they were divided in their affection.

Mr. Harrison had swung around the circle, and had given utterance to that phrase, which finds expression in the Republican platform, that he was in favor of every dollar being as good as every other dollar. No man ever saw one dollar that was not as good as another; but he coined that phrase, and it went into the Republican platform of 1892. Finally they concluded that Harrison was a little too far West; that he could not be depended upon at a critical time; that Cleveland had his office on Wall street, and that his associations and sympathies there were such that $400,000 of money went from those people into the campaign fund, and Cleveland was elected and Harrison defeated. One of those gentlemen who contributed so largely to this fund was Mr. John J. Van Alen. I think he gave $50,000. He was one of those American citizens who has become "so English, you know," that when he can not find a genuine fox to chase, he puts a darky on a horse, ties a piece of white paper to the horse, sends him through the woods, sets his hounds after that, and he and his friends chase it.

That man gave $50,000, as appeared in the sugar investigation—it is in a public document, and there is no question about it—to the Cleveland campaign fund, and in the course of events, Mr. Cleveland found something in his views of civil-service reform which permitted him to appoint that individual as minister or ambassador extraordinary to Italy. We had quite a contest over it, and that man was finally confirmed. Here was a man who gave $50,000 to the Presidential campaign fund, who was getting his quid pro quo in the form of a foreign appointment, and such a man as that received the approval of this Senate by a majority vote.

Was it any different when Mr. Harrison was elected? Not at all. The great and good Mr. Wanamaker, the superintendent of Sunday schools, it is said, gave $400,000 for the elevation of Benjamin Harrison to the Presidential office, and after a few suns had risen and set, after a few months had elapsed, the President saw fit to invite the great and good John into his Cabinet to act as Postmaster-General from that time on, and he did.

I speak of these things as conspicuous examples of civil-service reform. This rotten system is corrupting the very foundations of the Government itself. This placing of the Presidential office on an auction block for bids, and selling it to a man who will pay the most boodle for it, can go on uninterruptedly; but when it comes to a question of disposing of a little fourth-class post-office with a salary of $50 or $100 a year attached to it, civil-service reform must be enforced and insisted on!

Mr. HAWLEY. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. I take it for granted that neither the Senator from Nebraska nor anybody else in the world supposes that John Wanamaker gave $400,000 to make Benjamin Harrison President. Mr. Wanamaker is an active and influential politician, and I have no doubt that all he did was to circulate a paper for subscriptions and that he raised a large sum of money—how much I do not know, but I heard the sum mentioned once at $10,000. That, however, is the private business of the gentlemen contributing, and nobody supposes that Mr. Wanamaker gave $400,000 or that he bought his office, and I do not believe that there is a respectable Democrat in the United States who will say that he believes that Benjamin Harrison would have gone into any such contract or that anybody bought him or that he bought anybody else.

Mr. ALLEN. There was never a man in this world caught in doing what he ought not to do who did not have an apology and some subterfuge to offer for his conduct. I say that charge was made against Mr. Wanamaker and ex-President Harrison openly through the press of this country, and it never has been denied from that moment until this, when the distinguished Senator from Connecticut rises at his desk and denies it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Which charge? I do not understand distinctly what the charge is.

Mr. ALLEN. I will make it so distinct that you can understand it—that John Wanamaker contributed $400,000 to the Harrison campaign in 1892. That is the charge I refer to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to say that I do not believe it, and I do not know of anybody else besides the Senator who believes that Mr. Wanamaker contributed any such sum.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, there is not a Democrat on this side—mark you, now, a Democrat; I do not mean a Democrat sailing under Democratic colors who is a Republican—who will get up and say he does not believe it. No; they are perfectly silent here; but a bitter, uncompromising partisan of Harrison and of Wanamaker can say he does not believe it, and that he does not believe that anybody in this country believes it but me. I do not know whether it is true or not; I know the charge was made; that it rang from Maine to California, through the press of this country, and I have never heard it openly denied until this moment. The statute of limitations has run against it, I suppose, by this time at least. Harrison served out his term and passed into private life. To-day he undertakes the discharge of additional duties, and I suppose the American people will forgive him.

Mr. Cleveland will pass from the White House within the next eleven months back to his office in Wall street, to enjoy the fruits of his fortune, if he has one, made out of the misfortunes of this country, and the people will lose sight of him, and the crime that was committed in 1892 in contributing to his campaign fund will be forgotten; but the Mugwump who stands on his heel and howls every time he gets an opportunity about civil-service reform or the civil-service reformer, who has himself been particeps criminis in these greater offenses, will still continue to stand up and howl that all the old men and the old women in the little country post-offices must be swept aside for the dude.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to say a very few words.

Mr. ALLEN. I send to the desk an amendment which I desire to offer at the proper time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend by inserting, on page 2, after line 6, the following, as an additional proviso:

Provided further, That no subpost-office or station shall be established outside of or beyond the corporate limits of the town or city in which the principal office is established, nor shall a postmaster or clerk of any such subpost-office or station be appointed to administer the affairs thereof who is not at the time of his appointment a bona fide resident and elector of the community in which said subpost-office or station is located.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to say a very few words on the amendments. The amendment which the Committee on Appropriations put into the bill requires the establishment of a post-office at every county seat, restoring them where they have been discontinued. The present amendment proposes to give authority to the Postmaster-General to apply the money appropriated to the payment of any superintendent or other officer who may be substituted in place of the discontinued postmaster.

There is no doubt that the power to discontinue a post-office is involved in the power to establish it. There is no question that the power to establish a post-office was conferred in the creation of the Department; but, as has been truly said, the importance of this provision is that it places the officer substituted for the person who was the postmaster and upon whom the duties of that office were imposed subject to the civil-service law. That is all. It makes the selection of that officer from the general list of eligible persons having been examined and having passed. So from all parts of the United States, not from the State alone, a person eligible in the highest degree may under the amendment be assigned to the performance of the duties of postmaster at any place.

That brings up the whole question as to how far it is consistent with the theory of this Government to divorce the appointment of officers from the source in which the Constitution of the country has placed it. That is the question. The superior efficiency of such an organization may or may not be questioned, but certainly it could be attained equally by requiring the postmaster in any particular region of country to report to and be under the supervision of some one person in that particular locality. So it is not of the essence of the amendment that there should be superior efficiency to that which exists. But upon that subject it may be said that the constitutions of government are not formed upon the sole idea of efficiency. I believe it is Blackstone who in his Commentaries says, quoting from Montesquieu, that the best government in the world is a monarchy, provided you can be assured of the greatest wisdom and the greatest integrity in the person of the monarch. Certainly the greatest efficiency and the most direct execution of the law is to be found in the person of a monarch, a single person. But other considerations require that there should be different forms of government. Personal liberty, the preservation of the rights of every man as against arbitrary power constitute the foundation upon which liberal governments are established.

Now, what do we find upon the subject of civil-service reform, as it is called? We find that in this country the power of Executive duty was carefully considered and framed. And where was it placed? Where was the power to create offices and to fill them placed by the Constitution? I need not say that it was in the President of the United States and in the Congress of the United States, who are authorized to create inferior offices and vest the appointment in the heads of Departments. Is it an idle purpose to vest the appointing power of officers created by Congress in the heads of Departments? Has it any utility at all? Is it to be supposed that it has no purpose in this form of government and that the Executive power, the President of the United States, should have all power of appointment, of even the smallest officers of this Government, which may be created by Congress?

It is the proposition of those who advocate the amendment that the whole power of appointment of officers created by Congress shall be vested in the President of the United States and in three Commissioners, who shall execute this power under the sole will of the President, an officer who holds two-thirds of the legislative power of the Congress of the United States in every vote that is cast less 1 vote. That is the scheme which is now proposed in this and like amendments, that a single official, having two-thirds of the legislative power of this Government in his hands less 1 vote, shall have the sole power to appoint every officer in this Government from the smallest to the highest.

Now, is it safe to so intrust this power, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution? In the midst of this vast concentration of power, in the alienation of the franchises of taxation into private and individual hands as property, when the great corporations of this country, owned by a few men, some domestic and largely foreign, collecting three times the tax that the Government itself can collect, when a few individuals have accumulated by the power of taxation upon the people from one to five hundred million dollars each, is it wise and according to our system of Government, is it consistent with the preservation of this Government, that you should vest the power of appointing every officer from the lowest to the highest in the President of the United States and three men who are his creatures and subject to his will?

It seems to me that there is a consideration which should give us pause. It does not matter what the provisions of the statutory law are. It is true that the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] ought to be adopted which limits the power of creating substations and of putting into them, not postmasters of the vicinage, which ought to be required, for every postmaster ought to be selected according to the will of the patrons of the office in the locality, but persons selected from a list of eligibles embracing all the people of the United States. I undertake to say that if we continue the system by which you disfranchise from eligibility to office every man over 40 or 45 years of age and every man or woman under 20 years of age, and leave to the individual possessing this great power, the Presidency, the right still further to limit the qualifications, he may limit them to persons over 21 years of age and under 30 years of age. He therefore possesses the absolute power of depriving of eligibility the larger portion of the people of the United States.

But it is said that you must consider that officials will interpret the law reasonably and execute the law reasonably. That is not the proposition upon which constitutions and institutions of government are formed. They are formed upon the idea that public officials will not execute the laws fairly and justly, and restraints and limitations and checks and prohibitions are imposed upon the theory that the people shall be guarded against the abuse of power. So when it is proposed now that a list of eligibles shall be formed from persons who are over 20 and under 40 or 45 years of age, the power of appointment to be conferred not upon the heads of Departments, but upon rules formulated by a single man, the President of the United States, in my judgment you overthrow this form of government or place it in a condition where it may be subjected to great danger. But at all events, upon the pending appropriation bill a scheme of such great influence should not be allowed to go.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it appears that the consideration of the pending amendment does not involve necessarily, or, indeed, at all, any criticism either of the President of the United States or of the Postmaster-General. While I am not in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], and while I believe that the system with which we are to some extent threatened, looking to the consolidation of remote post-offices with city post-offices, is a bad one, I express that view without feeling that I am criticising anybody particularly. I have great personal respect for the Postmaster-General, but I also have my own views upon this subject.

In the report of the Postmaster-General made during the present session, page 40 of House Document No. 4, I find the following:

> The question of extending civil-service methods to the selection of fourth-class postmasters has naturally received my attention since I have been at the head of this Department. It is beset with difficulties which my experience as a Representative in Congress of a large country district during three changes of Administration has brought home to me more clearly than they might appear to a theoretical reformer or to the Representative of a city constituency. I have studied various bills introduced in both branches of Congress in recent years and welcomed suggestions from other quarters. But I do not find myself able to make, as yet, any specific recommendations on this important subject in the line of the legislation which has been proposed.

Here is a statement, therefore, made officially by the Postmaster-General to Congress, wherein he notifies us that, in his opinion, it is inadvisable, as the matter now appears to him, to pass any of the bills proposing to extend the classified service to postmasters of the fourth class.

Mr. President, there is an effort, as we learn from the discussion here, at least by some of those who advocate the amendment, indirectly to do that which the Postmaster-General does not feel that he is prepared to recommend.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator from California to read the next paragraph following the one he has read.

Mr. WHITE. I shall do so with pleasure.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator will see, then, that all the suggestion there is in regard to this amendment is in line with what the Postmaster-General has said.

Mr. WHITE. I will read the next section:

> The order which you have recently approved, providing that when the Postmaster-General shall consolidate with a free-delivery office any other post-office, such consolidation shall carry into the classified service at the free-delivery office the Post-Office Department roster of employees of the office consolidated, including the postmaster, may be accepted as the beginning and foundation not only of a better postal service of the public, a better and more business-like accounting to this Department, but also a wise extension of the civil-service system to postmasters. It is my purpose to proceed under the authority of this order as discreetly as I can, and in the long run as far as experience will justify, so as to secure these commendable results.

Is that all the Senator from Wisconsin alluded to?

Mr. VILAS. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. Reading that portion of the report of the Postmaster-General I arrive at a conclusion entirely opposite from that suggested by the interruption of the Senator from Wisconsin. It is well known to us all that as a rule the fourth-class post-offices are small affairs. As a general thing there are no clerks. In many of the rural regions of the United States some one attends to the post-office duties in his own house. This recommendation plainly has reference to larger offices where more business is done, because the Postmaster-General says:

> The order which you have recently approved, providing that when the Postmaster-General shall consolidate with a free-delivery office any other post-office such consolidation shall carry into the classified service at the free-delivery office the Post-Office Department roster of employees of the office consolidated, etc.

I would construe that recommendation, coupled with the other which precedes it, as meaning that the Postmaster-General does not favor consolidation in the case of small fourth-class offices, but that he does as to larger offices situated near a free-delivery office. Such would be my construction. However, as to what he intended perhaps others know better than I do.

Mr. President, I admit that the evil which must result from this amendment will depend upon the extent to which the Postmaster-General carries the authority with which he is to be clothed. I agree, also, that it is dangerous to extend power too far, but I likewise concur in the observation made by some one that it is impossible to place a nice, an absolutely correct, limitation. But we must construe the intention of the officers who are to execute this authority by what they have recently said, even since this report was written.

> A few days ago an order was issued from this office consolidating with the Brooklyn post-office 14 independent post-offices hitherto existing in the corporate limits of that city. Every post-office on Long Island Sound might thus be consolidated with the Brooklyn post-office, with an improvement of the service.

My attention was directed to the radical change proposed in the administration of the Department by the statement that every post-office on Long Island Sound might properly be consolidated with the Brooklyn post-office. Such an extensive and radical alteration in modes of procedure heretofore adopted seems to me worthy of more than passing consideration, and when I reflect that this discussion and this matter are injected into an appropriation bill, when it is impossible for us adequately to place before our view and to fully consider and act upon the various phases of the subject, I at once think that the amendment should be retired, so that it may be more fully and completely discussed.

My distinguished friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] referred to several cities in the United States within the corporate limits of which I understood him to say there were post-offices which should be or could be successfully consolidated. He has, I believe, a list before him—officially prepared, I suppose, as he tells us he has obtained the information from reliable sources—showing that within certain municipal jurisdictions there are various post-offices which really should be under central control. If I remember rightly, in the case of San Diego, which was the only instance in California cited by him, he referred to Point Loma and Sorrento and Lajolla and North San Diego as places within the jurisdiction or limits of the city of San Diego.

I wish to call the attention of my friend to this proposition. Point Loma is a very small office. The Senator himself will observe by looking at the returns that certainly it can not contribute more than a hundred or two hundred dollars per annum to the Government coffers. I do not believe it contributes that much. It is located 8 miles from the city of San Diego. Lajolla is 12 miles from the city of San Diego, not within the municipal limits at all. Sorrento is 15 miles distant, and they are all very small offices. It would be impracticable to bring them under one jurisdiction.

But it seems to me it would be bad policy at least to adopt any system which must result in sending a young man who has passed a civil-service examination from some of our cities, on his bicycle or by other mode of conveyance, to distribute mail in the rural regions to persons with whom perhaps he is not acquainted and to whom to some extent he may be a cause for alarm. Surely the particular instance cited by the Senator from Colorado as affording a justification for consolidation does not come even within the theory which he has advanced, and therefore I simply submit that he has been misinformed regarding it.

It is true that we ought to have the best service we can get, but it is likewise true that there are thousands of small post-offices in this country in towns where there reside a population who wish to administer the post-office as nearly as they can themselves, and in most cases they do. I know it has been said here, and it is true in many instances perhaps in larger offices, that communities do not obtain the men for postmasters whom they desire. But that is not generally true, especially in the smaller places where some one accepts the office really as a matter of accommodation to his neighbors. Take counties—and I am thinking of some in my own State—where there may be a town of eight or ten thousand inhabitants, and where there is a man of a higher class, so far as education and attainments are concerned, in the central post-office than in some of the country post-offices. I would not, for that reason, place the smaller offices under his jurisdiction. They get along very well. Of course, there may be burglaries committed; but I submit that the burglar will be just as liable to get into the office when it is attended by a gentleman who rides a bicycle as he will when it is attended by some old farmer in the country, who would be far more able in dealing with an unwarranted intrusion. There is nothing, I think, in the matter of loss.

When we come to the matter of embezzlement, I do not think there would be anything found there. I know, of course, that there may be frauds committed in the little post-offices, but I do not believe they are very extensive. There will be frauds committed in every service which we can devise, but I do not believe that if we change the method we will obtain any more honest men than we have now; and while theoretically it may be a good thing to create a great post-office trust and to put all of those people under one central control, practically I believe it will lead to a great deal of trouble.

For myself, so far as the patronage is concerned, I do not believe it is of any benefit to an individual to enjoy patronage. I do not think it is any satisfaction to an individual to have the authority to fill fourth-class post-offices throughout the United States. I would welcome a law which would consign to instantaneous death a member of Congress who would apply for any sort of an office for anybody.

But I do not think that now at this date we should add anything to the bill in this direction. The Senator from Iowa informs us that without any particular mention in the bill of the matter, $750,000 have been diverted into the clerk-hire channel, so as to enable the Postmaster-General to further experiment. I am unwilling to add anything to his power in this matter, because I do not think that a theory which is supported by an example which tells us that all the post-offices on Long Island Sound can be successfully consolidated in Brooklyn is a good system. It has nothing to commend it to me, or if there were any commendatory features they are overborne by others.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I know the Senator from California wishes to be accurate. May I suggest to him that the post-offices proposed to be consolidated are not on Long Island Sound, but on Long Island?

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Colorado will lend me his ear, I will read to him from the report of the Postmaster-General upon that subject, and it sounds to me as though I were right:

> Every post-office on Long Island Sound might thus be consolidated with the Brooklyn post-office.

So I said, or intended to say if I did not, that the proposition of the Postmaster-General was to consolidate all of the post-offices on Long Island Sound and bring them within the Brooklyn jurisdiction, and I think I was right about that. It rather astonished me, but I stated it upon that authority upon which I was told later in the discussion the Senator from Colorado largely relied.

I desire to say (though I do not consider it essential to this controversy) that I do not wish anything I have said to be construed into any reflection upon the civil-service system. Properly applied I approve of it, but I agree with the Postmaster-General that it is inapplicable to the conditions surrounding the service of the fourth-class postmasters of the country.

That is all I wish to say upon the matter, Mr. President.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I have listened to the argument of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with a good deal of interest, particularly that portion of it in which he said that the business could be conducted so much more cheaply. I have heard that from several. There is no doubt that the whole Government could be carried on much more cheaply if we trusted entirely to one man; but the question is, would it be as successful? All the arguments in regard to consolidation that I have heard have a tendency to advocate a system of one-man power with regard to the Post-Office Department. We all know that the post-office has been exceedingly popular, and that, although the Executives under different Administrations have sometimes appointed unfit men, they have invariably suffered politically for it, for it is the only outrage that can be usually met with adequate punishment if any political party attempts to interfere with the post-office. It belongs to the people in their local capacity, so much so that it has been very popular ever since I can remember to advocate the election of postmasters by the people, leaving the Executive the power of removal. Many Congressmen have been in the habit, when they were allowed to nominate, so to speak, or recommend the appointments in their districts, to submit it to a vote of the people. I think that very few members of Congress who have the responsibility of recommending a postmaster will now disregard the views of the citizens in the locality.

With regard to the post-office, the people have more to do with it. We are aware that republican government costs more to conduct than a monarchical government, but here is a branch of the service which has been regulated practically by the people and we see how popular the post-office is. The post-office is the most popular branch of the public service; everybody refers to it as a benefaction, and I believe it is, because it has been brought clearly home to the people.

With reference to supplying the local post-offices in the small localities, at the crossroads, under any civil-service arrangement, it would be impossible to do it as satisfactorily as the service is now performed. I believe nine times out of ten in very small places the man who takes the post-office is the country storekeeper at that point, or he has a drug store where everybody goes, and he is appointed practically by the people by unanimous consent. If he does not act right, complaint is promptly made. There are generally two persons, one Democrat and one Republican, where they are divided politically in that way, who live at the crossroads, and one or the other takes it when his party is in power, and both of them conduct the office satisfactorily. If either should prove unsatisfactory, there would be protest, and it is generally heeded.

I would be opposed to any consolidation that interfered with the favorite system of popular self-government as it has been conducted with regard to the Post-Office Department. Before we make any serious changes it should be discussed on something besides an appropriation bill, and the manner in which it can be carried out should be considered more at length than is possible at the present time. This is all I have to say.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I hope to finish the bill to-night, if practicable. We have now spent about five hours in the debate upon this proposition.

Mr. PEFFER. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me just a moment to propose an amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield a moment for that purpose.

Mr. PEFFER. I propose an amendment, to come in at the proper place. I ask that it be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided further, That when two towns or cities lie adjoining, but are situate in different States, the post-offices in said towns or cities shall not be consolidated in one office.

Mr. ALLISON. That is only an added reason why I should make the motion which I propose to make. I think the Senate thoroughly understand this question, and I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, with all the amendments thereto, upon the table.

Mr. PASCO. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me one moment? In order that there may be a direct vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, and without having it affected by the amendment which I offered, I will ask leave to withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. PASCO. Then the question will be settled entirely upon that amendment.

Mr. VILAS. I hope the Senator from Iowa will not make that motion yet. I wish to engage the attention of the Senate for a few moments in respect to some things that have been said regarding the remarks I made on Thursday. I do not believe the Senator would gain anything in time by pressing a vote on this subject unreasonably. I doubt whether it would be possible for us to dispose of the bill to-night.

Mr. ALLISON. I certainly do not wish to press the bill unreasonably or the disposition of the amendment unreasonably. If the Senator from Wisconsin could indicate to me how much time he desires I would withdraw the motion for that purpose; or if I can have an understanding that the amendment shall be voted upon after the Senator from Wisconsin has concluded his observations I will yield to him.

Mr. VILAS. So far as the time required by me is concerned, it will be just such as I find necessary to make the few remarks I desire to make. I can not engage for a vote for anybody else after I am done.

Mr. ALLISON. After the observations to be made by the Senator from Wisconsin I will test the sense of the Senate by moving to lay the pending amendment on the table.

Mr. VILAS. I trust the Senator from Iowa will withdraw that motion, because it cuts off debate.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that.

Mr. VILAS. And no debate is practically going to be cut off in that way. I certainly trust the Senator will not insist upon making the motion.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator to make that threat, and I understand perfectly well that the Senator from Wisconsin can make such observations as he chooses upon the bill at such time as he chooses; and that being true, I wish to test the sense of the Senate upon the amendment; that is all.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Iowa did not understand me correctly; I am sure he did not. I simply made a request which I think it is very common to have granted in the Senate. I certainly trust the Senator from Iowa is not, in his urgency to pass this appropriation bill, going to adopt a course of practice that is so unusual in this body. I have not engaged the attention of the Senate at length upon the subject. Several things have been said by the Senator from Florida on my right [Mr. PASCO] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] with respect to some observations I submitted to the Senate on Thursday that demand brief reply.

Mr. ALLISON. I wanted to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin and was asking him about how much time he would require, when he said to me that he did not expect to limit himself, but would occupy such time as he chose, and then notified me that the bill could not be finished to-night. If we are going on in this way, without having any arrangement, of course the Senator will make such motions as he sees proper to make. That is all I wish to say to the Senator from Wisconsin.

I desire to get through with the appropriation bill in a reasonable time. I desire also to give every Senator an opportunity to debate the pending question. But we have now spent from half past 12 until 5 o'clock upon this single amendment of the Senator from Colorado. I do not know, but from everything I can see about me the sense of the Senate is against the amendment. I only desire to test the sense of the Senate, not to cut off debate. Now, I will yield to the Senator from Wisconsin to make such observations as he chooses, and I give notice that after he has finished his remarks I shall renew my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether he withdraws his motion to lay the amendment of the Senator from Colorado on the table?

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw it for the time being.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment?

Mr. VILAS. With pleasure.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I shall try not to trespass upon the time of the Senate for more than three or four minutes, if I have to do so at all; but in view of the fact that I reported the amendment, it may be possible that I shall ask the Senator from Iowa to yield a moment to me to respond to one or two suggestions which have been made.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall certainly yield for that purpose. What I want is to have the bill disposed of before we adjourn to-day.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have no desire to take up any time.

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from Iowa does not insist upon going on to-night, I am willing that that motion shall be made. I do not feel that I am at liberty to yield for the purpose of making it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will try to be as amiable as possible. If we can fix an hour to-morrow when the pending bill shall be disposed of without further debate, and all amendments made to it or proposed to it hereafter shall be disposed of without debate, and the bill shall pass before final adjournment to-morrow, fixing an hour, I will yield to the wishes of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That there shall be no debate upon any other amendment? Is that the Senator's suggestion?

Mr. ALLISON. It is not. My suggestion is that we shall fix an hour to vote upon the bill and all amendments relating to it, and after that hour we shall proceed to vote without further debate. Then I will yield to the disposition of Senators as respects adjournment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have only to say that except as to the amendment respecting experimental offices, which I desire to call to the attention of the Senator from Iowa, I suppose very briefly, I know of no other amendment, so far as I am concerned, which will take any time in discussion.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent, then, that to-morrow at 3 o'clock we shall proceed to vote, without further debate, upon all amendments to the bill then pending or of which notice has then been given.

Mr. VILAS. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he ask that the vote be taken to-morrow, without fixing an hour.

Mr. ALLISON. I will ask unanimous consent that we may vote at 4 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa one question. Why not take the bill at the conclusion of the routine morning business and discuss it up to a certain hour, and then proceed with it under the five-minute rule for an hour or so and consider other amendments, and vote on it at 4 o'clock? Agreements upon other measures, such as the one proposed, have shut out the offering of amendments, the Senate having fixed a definite hour upon which to vote and the discussion having occupied the entire time up to that moment.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I will modify my proposition, in view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska. I request that we agree to take the bill up immediately after the routine business in the morning, proceed with it until 3 o'clock, and at 3 o'clock proceed with it, say, from 3 to 4, under the five-minute rule as provided by Rule VIII, and that at 4 o'clock we shall proceed to vote upon the bill and amendments without further debate.

Mr. ALLEN. And during which time amendments may be offered.

Mr. ALLISON. If they can be disposed of in the meantime, of course I shall make no objection.

Mr. VILAS. I suggest again to the Senator from Iowa that he simply ask the Senate to agree that a vote shall be taken to-morrow. We have had only one day's debate, practically, on the bill. There were some things said on it in a hurried way in the latter part of the afternoon for two or three days last week, but there has been very little discussion upon the bill of as much consequence as this is, and unfortunately, as I think, a good deal of it has been devoted to this very simple amendment to-day, taking a wide range beyond perhaps what the nature of the amendment called for. That is uncontrollable, but that ought not to prevent the discussion of the bill in other particulars in which it may be necessary to present some amendments and observations on the part of different Senators.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I will modify my request still further and ask the Senate to agree that we shall proceed until half past 3 o'clock to-morrow with the general debate; that from that hour we shall debate the bill under the five-minute rule, and at 5 o'clock proceed to take a vote upon amendments and on the bill without further debate.

Mr. CULLOM. Unless it is sooner disposed of.

Mr. ALLISON. Unless it is sooner disposed of.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Iowa pardon me? I have an amendment that I want to offer to the bill which might be ruled out on a point of order if the chairman of the committee objected to it. I should like permission to have the amendment read, so that I may know whether it would be objected to.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to my friend from North Carolina that I will be reasonable in respect to amendments and as to points of order.

Mr. BUTLER. But, if the Senator from Iowa will pardon me, if the point of order should be made against my amendment, it would have to go before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which will not hold a meeting until Wednesday morning.

Therefore, I much prefer the bill should not be acted on before Wednesday, so that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads could make a report upon it, in which case it would not be subject to the point of order. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to have the amendment read so as see if there is any objection to it?

Mr. ALLISON. I would prefer to have that subject considered when we reach it. Of course I know that it is within the power of a Senator to object if he chooses. I assure him that I will be reasonable with him as respects the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think there will be any objection to it, but I want to protect it against objection, which may be done by having the amendment read. It will take but a moment's reading.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will see that in making an adjustment now for a vote to-morrow I can not accept such a condition. Therefore I must decline his suggestion. Of course he has it in his power to object and thus to prevent me from obtaining the agreement which I very much desire.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ALLEN. I want just one definite understanding and then there is no objection on my part. That is, that at any time during the discussion under the five-minute rule amendments may be offered up to the hour of 5 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly, up to 5 o'clock.

Mr. VILAS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator, under that suggestion, to the fact that I shall desire to strike out from the bill the provision for necessary and special facilities on railroads, and if that amendment be not adopted I shall ask the Senate to reduce the amount to $175,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I will take no advantage of Senators as respects amendments. All I desire is to complete the consideration of the bill to-morrow and have unanimous consent that it may be done. I do not wish to detain the Senate here beyond a reasonable hour on that day. Therefore I have made every proposition that will facilitate what I wish to have done to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits again, Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to send to the desk an amendment to come in on page 7, line 25.

GEN. JOHN M. THAYER.

Mr. THURSTON. I ask unanimous consent to make a momentary statement concerning a bill that came over from the House to-day, and then I shall ask unanimous consent to have it passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 6644) granting a pension to Gen. John M. Thayer, United States Volunteers, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John M. Thayer, late brigadier-general and brevet major-general of volunteers, at a pension of $100 a month.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I rose to call up a pension bill, but I yield to the Senator from Iowa to make a statement.

Mr. ALLISON. I asked the Senator from Illinois to yield to me that I might state the unanimous understanding as respects the disposition of the Post-Office appropriation bill to-morrow. The request I made was, that immediately after the completion of the routine business in the morning the bill should be taken up and continued under the general rule of debate until half past 3; that from that time until 5 o'clock it should be considered under the five-minute rule, and at that hour we should proceed to vote upon all amendments and upon the bill without further debate.

Mr. ALLEN. With the right to move to amend up to what hour?

Mr. ALLISON. Up to 5 o'clock.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to ask a question for information. For instance, an amendment is to be offered suggesting that the experimental free-delivery offices be discontinued. The discussion upon that when it comes will be limited to the five-minute rule under this agreement?

Mr. ALLISON. If it does not come until half past 3 it will.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is very certain, of course, not to come until half past 3.

Mr. PASCO. Before we pass away from the appropriation bill, I ask leave to offer an amendment. I ask that it may be printed in the ordinary form and also in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. PASCO's amendment is as follows:

On page 2, after "seat," in line 6, insert the following additional proviso: "And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the establishment or maintenance of any station, substation, or branch post-office beyond the limits of any city or town in which the principal office to which such station, substation, or branch office is attached is located."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 2912) granting to the Atchison and Nebraska Railroad Company and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, its lessee in perpetuity, the right of way over a part of the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian Reservation in the States of Kansas and Nebraska;

A bill (H. R. 4632) for the relief of Frederick B. Betts, surviving partner of the firm of Betts, Nichols & Co.;

A bill (H. R. 5736) to authorize the Light-House Board to proceed with the construction of the light-house and fog signal on North Manitou Island, Lake Michigan; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 159) to authorize the Secretary of War to prepare and submit estimates for the improvement of the harbor at Portland, Me.

MISS MARY E. HULL.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senate to put on its passage the bill (H. R. 1141) granting a pension to Miss Mary E. Hull, dependent sister of John A. Hull, deceased, late of Company F, Eighty-first Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the late war of the rebellion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place upon the pension rolls the name of Miss Mary E. Hull, dependent sister of John A. Hull, deceased, late of Company F, in the Eighty-first Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the late war of the rebellion, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER February 27, 1896, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1141) granting a pension to Miss Mary E. Hull, have examined the same, and report:

The report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives hereto appended is adopted, and the passage of the bill is recommended.

HOUSE REPORT.

The evidence fully establishes the fact that the beneficiary in said bill was the sister of James and John A. Hull; that said James died in the service of his country in the war of the rebellion; that said John A. was a member of Company F, Eighty-first Illinois Volunteers, in the war of the rebellion, and also was in the Mexican war; that said Mary E. is now and always has been a single woman.

That her brother John A. was a widower when he entered the service of the United States in the war of the rebellion; that she lived with and was keeping house for him at said time; that he then had three young, helpless children, and the said Mary E. took charge of them during his absence, cared for and educated them; that she had no money or property of her own, but devoted her energies and life to her said brother John A. and his children both during and after the war; that her brother John A. remained a widower till his death.

That he died about eight years ago, leaving no property or money, and that said Mary E. has no property or money, is near 63 years of age, from disability is unable to support herself, and is dependent upon her friends for support; that said John A. Hull contracted disabilities while in the line of duty in the service of his country in the late rebellion from which he never recovered and of which he died; that he was at the date of his death drawing a pension for such disabilities; that said Mary E. was dependent upon her said brother John A. for support during his life, and since his death on the charity of friends; that from medical evidence furnished your committee she is now, from age and disability, unable to work or labor to support herself.

That she is and always has been a lady of good and irreproachable character and reputation, respected by those who know her; that said Mary E., by her devotion to the family of her said brother John A., caring for and rearing them from childhood to maturity, lost and abandoned the opportunities of young womanhood, and your committee, fully believing that after these years of devotion to this soldier of the Union and his children she should in her old days be cared for by a generous Government, recommend that said bill do pass at the rate of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PERRY COUNTY, TENN.

Mr. BATE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 4053. It is purely a local bill which has passed the other House. It will take but a few moments.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4053) repealing chapter 148 of the Supplement of the Revised Statutes of the United States. It proposes to repeal the act of March 3, 1875, chapter 148 of the Supplement of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and that the county of Perry, in the middle judicial district of the United States in the State of Tennessee, shall hereafter compose a part of the western judicial district of the United States in that State; and all cases now commenced or depending in the district affected by this act shall be heard, tried, and determined in the same manner as if this act had not been passed; and the prosecution of all crimes heretofore committed in the district shall be prosecuted and punished in the same manner as if this act had not been passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPITAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WALTHALL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 888.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 888) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company," approved March 2, 1892.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, to strike out all after the words "striking out," in line 6, and insert:

In the first section all after the words "a common seal," to the end of the section, and inserting the following: "Said corporation is hereby authorized to construct and lay down and complete a single or double track street railway in the District of Columbia, and run cars thereon for carrying passengers by and along the following route: Beginning at a point on the District line near the Potomac River southeast of Shepherd's Ferry, thence by such route as shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to the south side of the Eastern Branch or Anacostia River at the Navy-Yard Bridge; thence across said bridge to Eleventh street east; thence north on Eleventh street east to M street south; thence west on M street to a point to be located by the District Commissioners near Eighth street east, connecting with the lines of the Capital Traction Company, and returning over the same route to the point of beginning. Also, beginning at the eastern end of the Navy-Yard Bridge, easterly along Monroe and Harrison streets and Good Hope road, and from Good Hope road to the District line, over such route as the District Commissioners shall approve, and returning over the same route to the point of beginning: Provided, That within the city of Washington a double-track railway shall be constructed."

SEC. 2. That the motive power to be used on the lines in this act specified shall be the underground electric system within the city of Washington and the overhead trolley system outside the city of Washington. For crossing the Navy-Yard Bridge the said company may, in the discretion of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, use either horse power or the underground electric system to propel its cars; and the said company shall have the privilege of carrying an electric current across the said Navy-Yard Bridge in such manner as the said Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. That the Capital Railway Company and the Capital Traction Company are hereby required to issue free transfers at the point of intersection of their respective lines, so that for the payment of one fare a passenger on either road shall have the privilege of riding over the lines of both.

SEC. 4. That the portion of the company's route from Congress or Pencote Heights to Shepherd's Landing shall be completed within four years from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 5. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZA CRAIG HECKMAN.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1816) granting a pension to Eliza Craig Heckman, widow of Brig. Gen. Charles A. Heckman.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place the name of Eliza Craig Heckman, widow of Brig. Gen. Charles A. Heckman, on the pension roll at $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CUSTOMS OFFICERS AND ASSISTANT TREASURERS.

Mr. WHITE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 972) to provide for the continuance in office of customs officers and assistant treasurers until successors shall have been appointed and qualified.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that hereafter all customs officers and assistant treasurers appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, for a term of four years, shall hold their offices until their successors shall have been duly appointed and qualified according to law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD DEPOT GROUNDS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 5672.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5672) to grant to railroad companies in the Indian Territory additional powers to secure depot grounds.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to insert at the end of the bill, as a new section, the following:

SEC. 4. That all lands acquired under the provisions of this act shall be used for railroad purposes strictly, and not more than 20 acres of land at any one station shall be acquired hereunder by any one railroad company; nor shall any additional land be so acquired which is not contiguous to land already occupied for railroad purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

A. H. M'LAWS.

Mr. GORDON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5083) granting an increase of pension to A. H. McLaws.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to increase the pension of A. H. McLaws, of Dublin, Ga., late second lieutenant in Captain Dill's Company (B), First Georgia Regiment, Mexican war, to $20 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIBBONS OF HONOR.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 85) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the acts of July 12, 1862, and March 3, 1863.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue to any person to whom a medal of honor has been awarded, or may hereafter be awarded, under the provisions of the joint resolution approved July 12, 1862, and the act approved March 3, 1863, a rosette or knot to be worn in lieu of the medal, and a ribbon to be worn with the medal; said rosette or knot and ribbon to be each of a pattern to be prescribed and established by the President of the United States, and any appropriation that may hereafter be available for the contingent expenses of the War Department is hereby made available for the purposes of this act: Provided, That whenever a ribbon issued under the provisions of this act shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use, without fault or neglect on the part of the person to whom it was issued, the Secretary of War shall cause a new ribbon to be issued to such person without charge therefor.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out the proviso from that amendment. I do think it is too small a business for this Government to engage in to be furnishing ribbons to men who have had medals. It is small enough, I think, to furnish them in the first place; but when a man loses or defaces his ribbon, then to have the Secretary of War solemnly issue a little piece of ribbon to him, and send it to him by mail or express, seems to me to be absurd. I move to strike out that part of the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he knows of what the cross of the Legion of Honor is composed, which all French soldiers prize more than they do their lives?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not. Is there any little ribbon attached to it?

Mr. HOAR. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHOUP. Yes; there is a ribbon attached to it, and if it wears out, it is replaced.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why could not the man replace it himself?

Mr. SHOUP. The demand for these ribbons will be so small that dealers will not be justified in carrying them in stock, and the cost is but trifling.

Mr. COCKRELL. The cost is such a minimum and such a little thing that I do not think the Government should be called upon to furnish the ribbons; and I must insist on my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, to strike out the proviso which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the proviso at the end of the amendment, which reads:

Provided, That whenever a ribbon issued under the provisions of this act shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use, without fault or neglect on the part of the person to whom it was issued, the Secretary of War shall cause a new ribbon to be issued to such person without charge therefor.

Mr. SHOUP. I hope the Senator will not insist on that.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to the further consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the bill will go over.

CONDEMNED CANNON TO GUILFORD BATTLE GROUND COMPANY.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the joint resolution (S. R. 112) donating a condemned cannon and some shells to the Guilford Battle Ground Company, near Greensboro, N. C.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOG SIGNAL AT MENOMINEE HARBOR, MICHIGAN.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5363) authorizing the construction of a fog signal on the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor, Wisconsin.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "Harbor," to strike out "Wisconsin" and insert "Michigan"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., There is hereby authorized to be constructed, at the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor, Michigan, a fog signal, to cost not exceeding $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the construction of a fog signal on the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor, Michigan."

W. H. L. PEPPERELL.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 250) for the relief of W. H. L. Pepperell.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Postmaster-General to cause the accounts of W. H. L. Pepperell, late postmaster at Concordia, State of Kansas, to be credited with $1,545, and cause the credit to be certified to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, being on account of the loss of $1,345 in postage stamps and $200 in postal funds stolen from the post-office on August 27, 1887, it appearing that the loss was without fault or negligence on the part of the late postmaster, and appropriates $1,545 to pay the claim.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 7, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 6, 1896.

ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

William A. Little, of Georgia, to be Assistant Attorney-General.

PROMOTION IN THE REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

First Asst. Engineer Willits Pedrick, of New Jersey, to be a chief engineer in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States.

INDIAN AGENT.

John C. Keenan, of Stringtown, Ind., to be agent for the Indians of the Neah Bay Agency in Washington.

POSTMASTERS.

Ansel E. Chamberlin, to be postmaster at Dalton, in the county of Berkshire and State of Massachusetts.

Martin McCabe, to be postmaster at Winchenden, in the county of Worcester and State of Massachusetts.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 6, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

SEED DISTRIBUTION.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask the regular order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief announcement, with the consent of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a moment?

Mr. HITT. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the following letter be read for the information of the House. It is from the Secretary of Agriculture and relates to the subject of seed distribution.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 6, 1896.

SIR: Complying with your request, and what seems to be the almost unanimous desire of the House of Representatives, I have telegraphed Landreth & Sons that their proposition to put the seeds into packages of 5 instead of 15 packets (making 2,025,000 packages instead of 675,000) for $5,000 extra compensation has been accepted, and the seeds will be so done up.

Respectfully, yours,

J. STERLING MORTON, Secretary.

Hon. J. W. WADSWORTH,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives.

Mr. HULICK. That is right.

[The reading of the letter was received with applause.]

CUBAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House, the vote will now be taken on the report of the conference committee on the resolutions relating to Cuba.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HITT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITT. I withdraw the demand.

Mr. TUCKER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 247, nays 27, not voting 80; as follows:

So the conference report was adopted.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. DALZELL with Mr. CRISP.

Mr. WILLIAMS with Mr. HUTCHESON.

Mr. WOOMER with Mr. SORG.

Mr. HICKS with Mr. MOSES.

Mr. HARMER with Mr. DOWNING.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York with Mr. CLARKE of Alabama.

Mr. BREWSTER with Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi.

Mr. HULING with Mr. STALLINGS.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana with Mr. WILSON of South Carolina.

Mr. RANEY with Mr. COWEN.

Mr. WHITE with Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. SETTLE with Mr. RUSK.

Mr. CROWTHER with Mr. LAYTON.

Mr. MILLER of West Virginia with Mr. WOODARD.

Mr. HULICK with Mr. COX.

Mr. HEMENWAY with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. LOUD with Mr. KYLE.

Mr. ANDREWS with Mr. MINER of New York.

Mr. TRACEWELL with Mr. HENDRICK.

Mr. LORIMER with Mr. MAGUIRE.

On this vote:

Mr. DRAPER with Mr. GAMBLE.

Mr. JONES with Mr. TURNER of Virginia.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia with Mr. RUSSELL of Georgia.

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska with Mr. ERDMAN.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. LORIMER, is necessarily absent to-day. If present, he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CROWTHER], but it was expressly understood that I might vote on this proposition; and he asked me to state that if present, he also would vote "yea."

My colleague, Mr. SORG, was called suddenly away, and requested me to announce that if present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I find that I am paired with my colleague, Mr. TURNER, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I find that I am paired with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN]. I voted "yea," but withdraw my vote.

Mr. DRAPER. I understand that I am reported as being paired. I paired when going away, a week ago, with the understanding that the pair would expire on Saturday last. The pair related to political questions, and has expired; besides, this is not a party question; and I therefore voted and desire my vote to be recorded in the negative.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I inadvertently voted on this resolution, forgetting the fact that I was paired with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON]. I voted "yea," and withdraw my vote. He would vote "nay," if present. I wished to explain this fact.

Mr. TRACEWELL. Mr. Speaker, I see that I am paired, by a friend, with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HENDRICK]. If not paired, I should have voted "yea."

Mr. MERCER. My colleague [Mr. ANDREWS] is paired. If present, he would vote in the affirmative on this question.

Mr. McDEARMON. I was erroneously reported as paired. I voted, and wish the announcement of the pair to be withdrawn.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to have my vote recorded.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall and listening to his name?

Mr. WHEELER. I was detained at the door talking to a man, and when my name was called, in the confusion, I did not catch it in time to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening for his name?

Mr. WHEELER. I was, as well as a man can who is talking. I should like to have my vote recorded in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain a request under the rule, as the gentleman is aware.

Mr. FOOTE. Mr. Speaker, I was in the corridor when my name was called. If present, I should have voted "nay."

Mr. DAYTON. My colleague, Mr. HULING, was called home unexpectedly. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to ask that the gentleman from Alabama be permitted to record his vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain the request under the rules.

Mr. NEILL. I desire to have my vote recorded, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present?

Mr. NEILL. I was in the House during the second call.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule that is not sufficient.

Mr. NEILL. I can not say whether I was actually present when my name was called or not. I came in during the call. I should have voted "yea," if present.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask a recapitulation of the vote.

Mr. WHEELER. Would it be in order to state that I should have voted "yea"?

Mr. DALZELL. I find that I am paired with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. I voted "yea," but not knowing how he would vote, I will withdraw mine.

Mr. HULICK. I find, since recording my vote, that I am paired generally with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX]. I learn that he would have voted "yea," if present, and with the understanding that he would have so voted, I desire to let my vote stand.

Mr. FOOTE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have my name recorded. I was in the Hall when the first roll was called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening to his name?

Mr. FOOTE. I was just across in the cloakroom——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not allowed to entertain a request, under the rule, unless the gentleman was present and failed to hear his name.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. ACHESON, is unavoidably detained from the House. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. RICHARDSON. My colleague, Mr. COX, is absent by permission of the House. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JOY. I supposed, Mr. Speaker, that I was paired, and did not vote when my name was called. I find by the list of pairs, however, that the information given me was erroneous, and I ask to have my name recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to entertain the request under the circumstances.

Mr. JOY. I desire to say that I should have voted "yea," had I not been under the impression that I was paired.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The announcement was received with prolonged applause.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOOKER] moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7977) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, is it not proposed to read this bill at all? I understand that it carries ten millions of appropriations and authorizes about $50,000,000 of contracts.

Mr. HOOKER. This is generally the way this bill is passed. It passed this way in the last Congress.

Mr. DOCKERY. A bill carrying $62,000,000 of obligations ought to be read.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask that the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will have to be read, if gentlemen desire it, of course.

Mr. HOPKINS. Every member is familiar with this bill. It seems to me it is useless to take up the time——

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOOKER] has the floor.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, after a second shall have been considered as ordered, or has been ordered by the House, I propose to ask unanimous consent that debate upon the pending bill may be extended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I simply want about five minutes to speak upon this bill. Can I have that?

Mr. HOOKER. You shall have the time. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to considering a second as ordered, but I shall object to dispensing with the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, a second is ordered. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. COLSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COLSON. I rise to ask if any changes have been made in the bill since it was printed?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes; there have been some changes. I will state to the gentleman that there have been some immaterial changes ordered by the committee this morning, which changes I will explain when the bill is being considered.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended until 3 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOOKER] asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended until 3 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Is it to be general debate?

Mr. HOOKER. General debate, under suspension of the rules.

Mr. CATCHINGS. What was the request? I was unable to hear it.

The SPEAKER. That the time for debate be extended until 3 o'clock.

Mr. OWENS. I object.

Mr. HOOKER. Unless some agreement can be had, then only the debate can be had which is provided by the rule. I hope no objection will be made.

Mr. GIBSON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HOOKER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums of money be, and are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of the public works hereinafter named:

Improving harbor at Camden, Me.: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Improving harbor at Rockland, Me.: Continuing improvement, including project recommended by Chief of Engineers under date of December 14, 1895, $25,500, of which $1,500 may be expended for the removal of an old hulk sunk in the harbor: Provided, That contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary for the completion of said projects for the improvement of said harbor, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $760,500, exclusive of the amount herein and heretofore appropriated.

Improving Mooseabec Bar, Maine: Continuing improvement, $12,000.

Improving Portland Harbor, Maine, according to the report of the Chief of Engineers dated April, 1896, and continuing improvement of Back Cove, according to existing project, $20,000: Provided, That contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary for the completion of such projects, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $810,000, exclusive of the amount herein appropriated.

Improving harbor of refuge at Sandy Bay, Cape Ann, Mass.: Continuing improvement, $150,000.

Improving harbor at Gloucester, Mass.: Continuing improvement, $34,000: Provided, That of this appropriation a sum not exceeding $2,000 may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be expended in removing from Gloucester Harbor a pinnacle rock in the outer harbor, a rock called "Elisha's Rock," in the inner harbor, and a rock near the ferry landing at Rocks Neck, in the inner harbor.

Improving Woods Hole Channel, Massachusetts, $20,000, in accordance with project approved by Chief of Engineers.

Manchester Harbor, Massachusetts: The Secretary of War is directed, out of the appropriation on hand, to make a resurvey of Manchester Harbor with a view of straightening the channel between its mouth and Proctors Point, removing obstructions at the mouth of the channel and at the point of rocks, dredging the channel for its entire length between its mouth and the town wharf to a width of from 200 feet narrowing to 150 feet and a depth of 8 feet, and providing turning basins and anchorage for boats by the dredging of the flats for that purpose.

Improving New Bedford Harbor, Massachusetts: Continuing improvement, with a view of securing an increased area for anchorage in the upper harbor, in accordance with report submitted by Maj. D. W. Lockwood, in House document No. 59, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, $10,000.

Improving harbor Great Salt Pond, Block Island, R. I., $10,000, in accordance with the report of Chief of Engineers, November 29, 1895.

Improving harbor at Newport, R. I.: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

Improving harbor at Wickford, R. I., $6,300, in accordance with project of September 4, 1895, which said sum the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to expend from the balance on hand heretofore appropriated for entrance to Point Judith Pond.

Improving harbor at Bridgeport, Conn.: Continuing improvement, $18,000, in accordance with the modified project for the improvement thereof.

Constructing breakwaters at New Haven, Conn.: Continuing construction, $100,000.

Improving harbor at New Haven, Conn.: Continuing improvement, $10,000, and the Secretary of War is directed to make a resurvey and submit plans and estimates for the improvement thereof.

For continuing improvements at Stonington Harbor, Connecticut, $5,000, this sum to be applied for the completion of a dike or water break around Stonington Point.

Improving harbor at Five Mile River, Connecticut: Continuing improvement, $2,500.

Improving harbor at Duck Island, on Long Island Sound, Connecticut: Continuing improvement, $24,000.

Improving harbor at Stamford, Conn.: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Improving harbor at Coscob and Miamus River, Connnecticut: Continuing improvement, $8,000, in accordance with the modified and approved project.

Improving harbor at Norwalk, Conn., $10,000, in accordance with the approved modified project for the improvement thereof.

Improving harbor at Westport, Conn., in accordance with approved project for the improvement thereof. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to expend the sum of $3,000 out of the balance unexpended for entrance to Point Judith Pond, Rhode Island, for the improvement of said harbor at Westport, Conn.

Improving harbor at Buffalo, N. Y.: Improvement by extending the breakwater southerly to Stony Point: Provided, That contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to carry out such extension and the plan of such improvement as modified in the report of the Chief of Engineers for the improvement of that harbor for 1895, such contracts to provide that the sand-catch pier be extended to the bulkhead line, at a cost not exceeding $35,000, and that the northerly section of said extension to Stony Point and the sand-catch pier extension shall first be constructed, to be paid for as appropriations may, from time to time, be made by law, in the aggregate not to exceed $2,200,000.

Improving harbor at Canarsie Bay, New York: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Improving harbor at Charlotte, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $12,000.

Improving harbor at Sabine Pass, Texas: Continuing improvement, $50,000: Provided, That contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete the present project of improvement, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $1,403,856, exclusive of the amount herein and heretofore appropriated.

Improving harbor at Ashtabula, Ohio: Continuing improvements, $50,000, of which amount not less than $40,000 shall be applied toward the construction of breakwaters according to a survey and recommendation approved in 1894.

Improving harbor at Black River (Lorain), Ohio: Continuing improvements, including necessary dredging between piers, $20,000; and the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to cause a survey of said harbor to be made with a view to recommending such improvements as may be necessary to provide better access to said harbor and the safety of boats therein.

Improving harbor at Cleveland, Ohio: Continuing improvements, $80,000, to be used for extension of breakwater, according to plans heretofore adopted; also, in accordance with the recent report and recommendation of the local engineer, Col. Jared A. Smith, for repair and rebuilding, as well as relocation, when desirable, of the piers and breakwater already constructed, and for widening and extending the channel between the piers and in the outer harbor and maintaining the necessary depth: Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to enter into contracts for the completion of the above projects, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, the cost not to exceed in the aggregate $1,354,000: And provided also, That the Secretary of War be directed to cause a survey to be made of the said breakwater, as heretofore planned, with a view of determining the advisability of changing the plan thereof, so as to abandon the proposed construction of the eastern shore arm, and in lieu thereof extending the said breakwater eastwardly in a general direction parallel with the shore; and the sums hereby appropriated, or authorized to be expended, may be expended in such manner as the Secretary of War may deem best for the improvement of said harbor.

Improving harbor at Fairport, Ohio: Continuing improvement, $30,000, of which amount not less than $20,000 shall be applied toward the construction of a breakwater according to the approved project for the improvement thereof.

Improving harbor at Huron, Ohio: Continuing improvement and making necessary repairs to piers, $8,000.

Improving the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to St. Paul, Minn.: Continuing improvement, $375,000, of which amount $200,000 shall be expended on that portion of said river from St. Paul to the mouth of the Missouri River, and $175,000 from the mouth of the Missouri River to the mouth of the Ohio River: Provided, That on and after the passage of this act additional contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to carry on continuously the systematic improvement of the Mississippi River between the points mentioned, or said materials may be purchased and work may be done otherwise than by contract, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not exceeding in the aggregate $5,025,000: Provided further, That for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, said contracts and materials purchased and work done otherwise than by contract for the section of said river between St. Paul and the mouth of the Missouri River shall not exceed $200,000, and thereafter shall not exceed for the three years beginning July 1, 1897, the sum of $826,666.66 annually: Provided further, That such contracts and materials purchased and work done otherwise than by contract for that section of the said river between the mouth of the Missouri and the mouth of the Ohio River for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, shall not exceed the sum of $325,000, and thereafter for the three years commencing July 1, 1897, shall not exceed the sum of $673,333.33 annually: And provided further, That the money hereby appropriated and authorized to be expended in pursuance of said contracts for the said section of said river between the mouth of the Missouri River and the mouth of the Ohio River, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended in the construction of suitable dredge boats, portable jetties, and other suitable appliances, and in the maintenance and operation of the same, with the view of obtaining a navigable channel from St. Louis to Cairo not less than 250 feet in width and 9 feet in depth.

That $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the money herein appropriated for the improvement of the Mississippi River between Cairo and the mouth of the Missouri River shall be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to protect the east bank of the Mississippi River from caving in and being washed away at or near a point opposite the mouth of the Missouri River and extending south along said east bank as far as may be necessary to effect the purpose above mentioned.

That of the money herein appropriated for use on the Mississippi River from Cairo to the mouth of the Missouri River the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is directed to be expended in removing the bar in front of Chester, Ill., and protecting the west bank of the Mississippi River opposite Chester, Ill.

That of the money herein appropriated for the improvement of the Mississippi River from St. Paul to the mouth of the Missouri River there shall be expended the following respective amounts, or so much thereof as may be necessary, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in improvements at, the following places, to wit:

For the protection from erosion of the east bank of the Mississippi River along and in front of the Sny Island Levee in the counties of Adams, Pike, and Calhoun, in the State of Illinois, by revetment work, $50,000.

For the removal of the bar in the Mississippi River, on the east side thereof, opposite the cityof Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, $5,000.

For the repair and maintenance of the natural and artificial banks of the Mississippi River from Warsaw to Quincy, in the State of Illinois, $5,000.

For dredging the channel at Quincy Bay, at Quincy, in the State of Illinois, $5,000.

For removing the sand bar in front of the steamboat landing at Quincy, in the State of Illinois, $10,000.

For maintaining the harbor at Rock Island, Ill., $5,000.

For maintaining the harbor at La Crosse, Wis., $5,000.

For the purpose of constructing a harbor of refuge on the west shore of Lake Pepin, Mississippi River, at or near Kings Coulee, between Lake City and Reeds Landing, Minn., $30,000.

For the purpose of continuing the work of constructing artificial banks between the mouth of Flint River, in Des Moines County, Iowa, and running along the west bank of the Mississippi River to the mouth of the Iowa River, $50,000.

And the Secretary of War, out of the money herein appropriated for the improvement of the Mississippi River, from St. Paul to the mouth of the Missouri River, shall cause surveys to be made as follows:

On the east side of the Mississippi River, commencing at Drurys Landing, in Mercer County, State of Illinois, and running along the east bank of said river to New Boston, with a view to the improvement of navigation by preventing the overflow of the natural and artificial banks, and by deepening the channel; also along the east bank of said river, from at or near the city of Oquawka, Ill., to at or near Dallas City, in the said State, with a view to the improvement of navigation by preventing the overflow of the natural and artificial banks and by deepening the channel, with an estimate of the cost thereof; also on the west side of said river from the bluff above the city of Madison, Lee County, in the State of Iowa, along the west bank of said river to the mouth of Skunk River, in said Lee County, and along the west bank of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Iowa River, in Louisa County, to the city of Muscatine, in Muscatine County, Iowa, with a view of improving the navigation by preventing the overflow of the natural and artificial banks and by deepening the channel.

Also on the west side of the Mississippi River, commencing at a point near Lagrange, in the county of Lewis and State of Missouri, above high water, running along the bank of the river to a point near the railroad bridge over the Mississippi River, near and above the city of Hannibal, in the county of Marion and State of Missouri, with the view of improving navigation by preventing the water from overflowing the natural and artificial banks along that part of the river and deepening the channel.

Also of the Egyptian levee, beginning at a point on the Des Moines River, in the county of Clark, State of Missouri, running along the south bank of said river to or near the Mississippi River at Alexandria, thence along the west bank of said river to terminus of said Egyptian levee, and estimate the cost of raising and strengthening said levee so as to confine the water to the river and thereby deepen the channel and improve navigation.

Also commencing at Drurys Landing, in Rock Island County, Ill., and running along the east bank of said river to New Boston, Ill., with a view to improving the navigation by preventing the water from overflowing the natural and artificial banks along those parts of the river and deepening the channel.

Improving Mississippi River from Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, including salaries, clerical, office, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Mississippi River Commission: Continuing improvement, $625,000, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission, as approved by the Chief of Engineers, for the general improvement of the river, for the building of levees, and for surveys, including the continuation of the survey between Head of Passes and the head waters of the river, in such manner as in their opinion shall best improve navigation and promote the interests of commerce at all stages of the river: Provided, That on and after the passage of this act additional contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to carry on continuously the plans of the Mississippi River Commission as aforesaid, or said materials may be purchased and work done otherwise than by contract, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not exceeding in the aggregate $3,375,000: Provided further, That for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, said contracts, and materials purchased, and work done otherwise than by contract shall not exceed the sum of $625,000, and thereafter shall not exceed the sum of $2,583,333 annually for the three years beginning July 1, 1897: Provided further, That the money hereby appropriated and authorized to be expended in pursuance of said contracts, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended in the construction of suitable dredge boats and other devices and appliances, and in the maintenance and operation of the same, with a view of obtaining a navigable channel from Cairo down, not less than 250 feet in width and 9 feet in depth: Provided further, That of the sum hereby appropriated and authorized to be expended the sum of $64,000 shall be expended in the rectification of the banks at Greenville, Miss., and $64,000 in the rectification of the banks at Helena, Ark., according to late plans submitted by Capt. Graham D. Fitch, Corps of Engineers, and $16,000 in the rectification of the banks at New Madrid, Mo.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is directed to cause to be prepared a compilation of all general laws that have been enacted from time to time by Congress for the maintenance, protection, and preservation of the navigable waters of the United States which are now in force, and to submit the same to Congress at its session in December next, together with such recommendation as to revision, emendation, or enlargement of the said laws as, in his judgment, will be advantageous to the public interest.

SEC. 3. That section 13 of "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved September 19, 1890, is hereby amended by inserting the words "fifty thousand dollars" in lieu of the words "twenty-five thousand dollars" therein contained.

SEC. 4. That for preliminary examinations, surveys, except where otherwise herein especially provided for, contingencies, expenses connected with inspection of bridges, the service of notice required in such cases, the examination of bridge sites and reports thereon, and for incidental repairs for which there is no special appropriation for rivers and harbors, $100,000: Provided, That no preliminary examinations, survey, project, or estimate for new works other than those designated in this act shall be made: And provided further, That after the regular or formal report on any examination, survey, project, or work under way or proposed is submitted, no supplemental or additional report or estimate for the same fiscal year shall be made unless ordered by a resolution of Congress. The Government shall not be deemed to have entered upon any project for the improvement of any waterway or harbor mentioned in this act until funds for the commencement of the proposed work shall have been actually appropriated by law.

SEC. 5. That under the authority to make contracts for materials and work under the provisions of this act, in addition to the sums appropriated herein, the Secretary of War shall not obligate the Government to pay in any one fiscal year, beginning July 1, 1897, more than 25 per cent of the whole amount authorized to be let by any one of said contracts, except as herein otherwise specifically authorized to do: Provided, Any part of the annual allotment of 25 per cent herein provided for not earned and paid for material furnished or work done in one fiscal year may be paid for material furnished and work done under the contracts in any subsequent fiscal year: Provided, This limitation shall not apply to any project placed under contract wherein the total amount authorized to be expended shall not exceed $500,000.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause preliminary examinations to be made at the following localities, to wit:

ALABAMA.

Beginning at a point at or near the site selected for Lock No. 13 on the Warrior River, and continuing up Valley River from its mouth, following the general course of said stream to Bessemer, Ala., thence up the valley to Birmingham and beyond to Five Mile Creek, at a point where sufficient head can be obtained to supply water for that part of said canal between Five Mile Creek and Bessemer, Ala. Said channel to have a minimum depth of 6 feet and be at least 50 feet in width at the water line.

CALIFORNIA.

Humboldt Harbor, dredging same along city front.
Napa River, to straighten channel from Napa to a point south of Carrs Bend and to make cut through Carrs Bend.
Petaluma Creek; straighten channel from railroad bridge to Donohue Landing.
Suisun Creek.

DELAWARE.

St. Johns River.
Cedar Creek.
Mispillion River.

FLORIDA.

Anclote River.
Jupiter Inlet.
Hillsboro Bay.
Crystal River.
Cedar Keys.

ILLINOIS.

The upper Illinois River and lower Des Plaines River, with a view to extension of navigation from Illinois River to Lake Michigan at or near Chicago.

KANSAS.

Neosho River, from the north line of Neosho County to the south line of Labette County, with a view to straightening and otherwise improving the channel of said river.

KENTUCKY.

Treadwater River.

LOUISIANA.

Bayou Grossetete.

MAINE.

Union River, near the city of Ellsworth, in Hancock County.
South channel of branch of Penobscot River, in Frankfort, in Waldo County, with view of removing an old wreck, and estimate of cost thereof.
Boothbay Harbor.
Chandlers River.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Salt Pond and Herring River, in Harwich.
Gurnet Rock and other rocks at mouth of Plymouth Harbor.
Duxbury Beach, with view to protection of harbor.
Duxbury Harbor, with view to widening and deepening improvement.

MICHIGAN.

Raisin River, in Monroe County, from mouth to Government Canal to the wharves.
Huron River, from mouth to the point of crossing by the Michigan Central Railroad.

MINNESOTA.

Mille Lacs Lake, with a view to the construction of a dam at the outlet on section 33, township 33 north, in range 27 west, in Mille Lacs County, for the aid of navigation on the Mississippi River, the same to be part of the general Upper Mississippi River reservoir system.
Stillwater, for preservation of harbor.

MISSISSIPPI.

Homochitto River, from mouth to the Yazoo and Mississippi Valley Railroad.
Coldwater River.
Ship Island Pass, with view to obtaining a channel of 26 feet depth at low tide in said pass between the Gulf of Mexico and Ship Island Harbor.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Oyster River.

NEW JERSEY.

Oldmans Creek.
Dividing Creek.
Wading River.
Tuckerton Creek and flats at mouth thereof.
Beach Thoroughfare at and near the meeting of tides from Absecon and Egg Harbor Inlet.
Barnegat Bay, between Mantoling and Bay Head.

NEW YORK.

Channel connecting Flushing Bay and Newtown Creek.
Catskill Creek.
Oswego River, Oneida Lake, and Mohawk River, so as to connect them.
Mohawk River, between Rome and town of Schuyler.
Nyack Harbor.
Alexandria Bay.
Black River to harbor at Dexter.
Coney Island Creek.
Oyster Bay, with a view to its connection with Lloyd Harbor.
Channels between Far Rockaway and Inwood.
Northport Harbor.
Smithtown Harbor.
Wallabout Channel, by cutting off portion of island known as Cob Dock and securing width of 300 feet and depth of 20 feet.
Coney Island Channel, from Nortons Point to the bell buoy to the depth of 16 feet.

NORTH CAROLINA.

For a jetty near Bogue Inlet in order to remove sand bars.

OREGON.

Alsea River, from head of tide water to upper Alsea Valley.
Yaquina River, from the town of Yaquina to head of tide, including Big Elk River to Sunset Quarry.
Long Tom River, from mouth to town of Monroe.
Santiam River, from Jefferson to Willamette River.
Umpqua River, bar and entrance.
Siletz River, bar and entrance.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Removing dam in upper Allegheny near Corydon, and dam at Russell, and the rapids at or near Waterboro in the Conewango Creek, a tributary of the Allegheny River.

RHODE ISLAND.

Channel through Conanicut Island, Narragansett Bay.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Bartrand River.

TEXAS.

Channel between Brazos River and Galveston Bay.

WISCONSIN.

Portwing.

ARIZONA.

Colorado River.

WASHINGTON.

Puyallup River.
Neah River, with a view to its improvement as a harbor of refuge.
Duawamish River and its tributaries.
Mouth of Willopa River.
North River.
North Fork of Lewis River to head of tide water.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War is hereby directed, at his discretion, to cause surveys to be made and the cost of improvement to be estimated at the following localities, to wit:

ARKANSAS.

White River, Batesville to Buffalo Shoals, with a view to improving by slack-water navigation.
St. Francis River, Sunk Lands to Poplin, Mo.

CALIFORNIA.

Alviso Creek.
Shag Rock, Arch Rock, Blossom Rock, Two Mission Rocks, Anita Rock, all in San Francisco Harbor.
Redwood Creek.
Mare Island Strait.

CONNECTICUT.

Southport Harbor.
New Haven Harbor.
Housatonic River.
South Norwalk.
Niantic Harbor.

FLORIDA.

Apalachicola Bay.
Tampa Bay.
Withlacoochee River.
St. Lucia Inlet and River.

IDAHO.

Pend Oreille River (Flat Head River).

KENTUCKY.

Mouth of Tennessee River.
Green River, at or near its mouth, for new lock and dam.
Mouth of Cumberland River.

LOUISIANA.

Bayou Teche, St. Martinville to Port Barre.

MAINE.

Royal River.
Bagaduce River, leading up to Penobscot village.
Bangor Harbor and Penobscot River, including mouth of Kenduskeag River.

MARYLAND.

Inner Harbor Rock Hall.
Cambridge Harbor.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Merrimac River, from Lowell to New Hampshire State line.
Marblehead Harbor, with a view to improving the harbor by building a sea wall to protect the isthmus connecting Marblehead with the town of Marblehead.
Provincetown Harbor, with a view of erecting a dike for the protection of that harbor.
Neponset River.
Lynn Harbor, with a view to securing a channel 300 feet wide and 15 feet deep at low water.
Boston Harbor, with a view to securing a channel 1,200 feet wide and 30 feet deep from the navy-yard to the entrance of the present main ship channel, and from the main ship channel in Presidents Roads through Broad Sound Channel.
Mount Hope Bay and Fall River Harbor.
Manchester Harbor.
Connecticut River, between Holyoke and the foot of the rapids.
Harbor at Plymouth.

MISSISSIPPI.

Channel at the mouth of Pearl River leading to deep water in the Missisippi Sound, with a view to obtaining a 17-foot channel at low tide.
Pascagoula River, commencing at a point in the Mississippi Sound where the depth of water exceeds 17 feet, thence to the mouth of and up said river to the intersection of Dog River, and thence up Dog River 3 miles, with a view to obtaining a channel of 17 feet at low tide along the line of survey.
Horn Island Pass, and the passage leading from said pass to the anchorage inside Horn Island, with a view to obtaining in said pass and passage leading therefrom a channel of 20 feet at low tide.
Big Sunflower River, with a view to improving the same by locks and dams as high as Clarksdale.

MINNESOTA.

Big Stone Lake, with a view to the construction of reservoirs, in accordance with the report of Maj. W. A. Jones, of the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, dated January 16, 1895.
Red Lake River, with a view of improving Red Lake River from Thief River Falls to the Red Lake, in accordance with the report of Maj. W. A. Jones, of the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, dated February 26, 1895.

MICHIGAN.

Kalamazoo River from Saugatuck to New Richmond.
Harbor of Frankfort, with a view of obtaining an 18-foot depth of water.
Harbor of Holland (Black Lake), with a view of obtaining a 16-foot depth of water.
Harbor of Monroe, with a view of obtaining a 14-foot depth of water.
Harbor of refuge at Ontonagon, affording 18-foot depth of water.
Harbor at Menominee, Michigan and Wisconsin, with a view of obtaining a 20-foot depth of water.
Harbor at Charlevoix, with a view of obtaining 16-foot depth of water.
Rouge River, from Wabash Bridge crossing to Maples Road, with a view of obtaining 16-foot depth of water, expense thereof to be paid from money on hand for improvement of Rouge River.
South Haven.
Ludington Harbor.
Saginaw River.

NEW JERSEY.

Mantua Creek.
Salem River, from its mouth to Salem City.
Rahway River, from its mouth to Main Street Bridge.
Elizabeth River.
Absecon Inlet, with a view of maintaining 10 feet of water over the bar.

NEW YORK.

Bay Ridge, Gowanus Creek, Red Hook, and Buttermilk channels, with a view to making one continuous channel 30 feet in depth and of equal width.
Oak Orchard Harbor.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Cape Lookout harbor of refuge.
For a jetty near Bogue Inlet, to remove sand bar.

OREGON.

Clatskanie River, to town of Clatskanie.
Tillamook Bay, bar and entrance.
Nehalem River, from modified plan, to be paid for out of money on hand.

OHIO.

Starve Island Reef, near South Bass Island, in Lake Erie, with a view to obtaining a navigable channel 25 feet in depth over said reef.
Ohio River, Marietta to its mouth.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Schuylkill River.
Erie Harbor.
Allegheny River, to determine what remaining portion of said river can be made navigable, and the number, location, and cost of the necessary dams therefor.

RHODE ISLAND.

Sakonnet Point.
Easterly breakwater to shore, Point Judith, at Point Judith harbor of refuge.

TEXAS.

Sabine Lake.

TENNESSEE.

Emory River, from its mouth to the town of Harriman.

VERMONT.

Missisquoi River, Swanton to lake.

WISCONSIN.

Harbor at Kenosha, with a view to obtaining a channel 21 feet deep and basin 20 feet deep.
Harbor at Racine, with a view to obtaining a channel 21 feet deep.
Harbor at Milwaukee, with a view to obtaining a channel 21 feet deep.
Harbor at Ahnapee.
La Crosse Harbor.
Sheboygan, with a view of obtaining 21 feet.

MONTANA.

Kootenai River, for removal of obstructions above Jennings.

WASHINGTON.

Lewis River, from Columbia River to La Center.
Pend Oreille River, from its source at Lake Pend Oreille, Idaho, to the town of Metalline, Wash.
Bellingham Bay, from deep water to the mouth of Whatcom Creek, at New Whatcom.
Okanagon River.
Quillayute Harbor and River.

During the reading of the bill,

Mr. DINGLEY said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. It is important that the House should hear the bill read, in order to know what modifications have been made.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. Gentlemen desiring to converse will please retire to the cloakroom.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill as read be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered, and that the bill as read be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOOKER. A second has already been ordered, and my request is that the bill as read be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill as read may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOOKER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my request, which I made some time ago, to enlarge the time for debate upon this measure.

A MEMBER. I object.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask that general debate be continued until 4 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule forty minutes would be allowed for debate. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended until 4 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think that would only be an extension of about thirty minutes or less.

Mr. HOOKER. It would be more than that.

Mr. HEPBURN. There ought to be more debate than that upon this bill, which carries or authorizes $63,000,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the time might be extended until 5 o'clock.

Mr. HOOKER. I make that modification of my request.

Mr. HEPBURN. It will be remembered that the gentleman told us this morning that there had been amendments made to this bill this morning. Nobody knows what those amendments are. There ought to be some opportunity for explanation, and we ought not to commit ourselves to this extraordinary expenditure of $63,000,000 with only forty minutes for debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended until 5 o'clock this evening. Is there objection?

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask that the time may be extended until 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks that it be extended to 5 o'clock.

Mr. HOOKER. That is my request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the request—that the debate be extended until 5 o'clock.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Is it understood that the bill will then be open to amendments?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No, sir. This is a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Then I object.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would state to the gentleman from California that the effect of his objection is to cut off debate, and does not put him in any better condition for amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule forty minutes is allowed for debate, twenty minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOOKER] and twenty minutes by those opposed to the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Who is to be recognized in opposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri will be recognized to control the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. OWENS. The Chair called to know whether there was objection or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asked if there was objection to the request of the gentleman from New York to extend the time for debate until 5 o'clock, and the gentleman from California objected.

Mr. OWENS. Objection was made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection has been made.

Mr. OWENS. I did not know that.

Mr. HOOKER. I yield five minutes——

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent that the debate be extended until 4 o'clock. Gentlemen will not object to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. HOOKER. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. BURTON of Ohio].

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, one of the leading features of this bill is the number of projects that are put under continuing contracts. That is to my mind the most commendable feature of the bill, and therefore has my hearty approval. In the preservation of our public works that system will be adopted in all the biennial appropriations under the river and harbor act——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend. The House will be in order.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, if there is to be no opportunity to offer amendments to this bill, I have no objection to the debate continuing until 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California withdraws his objection to extending the time for debate on this bill until 5 o'clock. Is there further objection?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The withdrawal of the objection is too late. Debate has proceeded under the rule.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the leading feature of this bill is the number of projects placed under the continuing-contract system. This is at the same time its most commendable feature.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend. The House will be in order.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, if there is to be no opportunity to offer amendments to this bill, I have no objection to the debate continuing until 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California withdraws his objection to extending the time for debate on this bill until 5 o'clock. Is there further objection?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The withdrawal of the objection is too late; debate has proceeded under the rule.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. In the prosecution of our public works, so sure as we pursue the best methods, this plan will be adopted in all. I hope the time is not far distant when this biennial river and harbor act will include only provisions for repair and maintenance and for the payment of the first installment on projects, appropriations for which thereafter will be made annually as the work progresses. In the first place, this is the most economical system. It requires little discrimination to see that for every project a plant must be provided and certain expenses incurred, whether the whole of the work is to be done or only an insignificant fraction of it.

Notwithstanding the fact that the new method has not yet been tried under the most favorable circumstances, we are not without experience as to its results. It appears that public works placed under this system in 1890 and 1892 have been finished at a diminished cost, varying in amount, but averaging 30 per cent. A communication from the Chief of Engineers dated March 25, 1896, addressed to Hon. W. B. HOOKER, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, contains the following references to specific projects:

Harbor at Charleston, S. C.—The saving by the continuous system of appropriations was $545,500, being for the portion covered by the contract at the rate of 53 per cent.

Harbor at Savannah, Ga.—The total saving which can be determined as resulting in Savannah Harbor from the system of continuing contracts has been, in round numbers, $900,000, or about 25 per cent of the entire cost of the improvement.

Mississippi River from the Head of the Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River.—It is estimated that the saving by lowering the prices 20 per cent under the continuing contracts equals $1,000,000.

Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to Minneapolis, Minn.—The great advantage and economy of work under this system of continuous appropriations have been most manifest. The cost of work both by day labor, in which the Government may be considered as the contractor, and under contracts with private parties has been materially reduced. Under conditions of uncertainty as to amount of future appropriations or time of availability it is impossible to make definite arrangements for procuring labor or material long in advance or in sufficient quantities to justify contractors in making adequate arrangements and low prices. The saving to the United States as a result of the continuing appropriations has been, for the portion of the Mississippi between the mouth of the Missouri and Minneapolis, not less than 15 per cent, or approximately $500,000 in the four years' work. For the stretch from the mouth of the Ohio to the mouth of the Missouri the saving was fully as much, making the saving for the Mississippi between the mouth of the Ohio and Minneapolis under the four years of continuing appropriations about $1,000,000. The future percentage of saving which may be expected to result from a continuance of the system of continuous appropriations would be even greater, as the work is more thoroughly organized.

Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City, Iowa.—Comparing the results obtained under the two systems, it is seen that the work as carried on under continuous and undiverted appropriations can be executed from 25 to 50 per cent less than when executed under the system of annual and uncertain appropriations.

Ship channel connecting waters of the Great Lakes between Chicago, Duluth, and Buffalo.—It is believed that in this work of improvement the saving under the continuous-contract system has not been less than $500,000, or about 15 per cent of the original estimate.

Humboldt Harbor and Bay, California.—Considering the amount of work already done and the amount estimated to complete the work, it is calculated that there is a saving under the continuing-contract system of $682,292, or about 30 per cent.

A letter from the late General Casey, former Chief of Engineers, dated March 30, 1892, contains the following:

At the Hay Lake Channel the work, estimated to cost $2,659,115, will be completed upon the execution of the existing contracts, and fully $900,000 within the estimate, a saving of one-third, or 33 per cent.

Also:

Philadelphia Harbor.—The price under the continuing contract is only 33 per cent of the average price which during the past ten years has been paid on the Delaware for similar dredging under annual contracts.

In addition to the direct results from actual saving in cost, equally important advantages arise from the earlier utilization of the completed project and the diminished injury from deterioration or decay resulting from tardy completion of the work by sections. Under the traditional policy for the construction of buildings and for river and harbor improvements, piecemeal appropriations are doled out in a halting and dilatory manner, and often before the capstone is placed upon a structure the foundation begins to rot; and before a breakwater or pier is finished, the end at which it was commenced is so decayed that the waves of the first storm threaten to wash it away.

Not only is this the most economical plan, it is at the same time, it is not too much to say, more courageous and honest. Under the old system of biennial appropriations partial appropriations were made for the beginnings of expensive public works when the facts as to the total amount required were not well known to the House and without the careful consideration, which would have been given, had there been discussion upon the desirability of appropriating the full amount necessary. The result was that many projects were undertaken without sufficient knowledge of their merits; but after the work was once commenced, the argument was used that the Government should not abandon the project to which we had committed ourselves by partial appropriations, because the amount already expended would be lost and we should be subjected to the reproach of having abandoned enterprises once begun.

Under the new system, the inevitable result will be to give more careful consideration to a project before it is commenced and then, if adopted, to prosecute it to completion in the most prompt and economical manner.

The argument is also made that this bill is extravagant. This argument comes with very poor grace when we consider that this House a few days ago, almost without a dissenting voice, appropriated in one bill over thirty millions for our naval establishment. This is the one appropriation made by the General Government, the immediate result of which is to increase the wealth and commercial development of our country. Indeed, it not only provides better channels and harbors for commerce, but even in case of war provides improvements for waterways quite as essential for our safety as battle ships and cruisers. The sums expended are not extravagant, but, on the contrary, very small, when we take into account the enormous extent of our seacoast along the Gulf and the two great oceans, and the unequaled mileage of our rivers, to which we must add the marvelous traffic on the Great Inland Lakes, the most surprising of all.

In order to maintain our place among the nations we must increase our exports. The sharp competition which has been brought to bear in supplying our home markets has not yet been exerted in securing foreign trade. This is largely due to the fact that we have a home market the greatest in the world, and by the further fact that, until within the last twenty years, we [illegible] with little effort, a practical monopoly in supplying foreign markets with staple products. Until recent years we largely supplied the markets of the world with cotton, the fabric most used for clothing; with the wheat which furnishes bread; also with tobacco, the luxury used by the greatest number. But in recent years active competitors have arisen in the furnishing of each of these staples in either hemisphere and on both sides of the equator. In order to regain and maintain the great advantage which we formerly possessed, nothing can be of so great an assistance as the improvement of our great harbors and the development of a better system of inland transportation by improving navigable rivers.

Neither is the objection that appropriations for rivers and harbors have sometimes been wasted a valid one. Beyond the inevitable loss or waste belonging to every system of expenditure maintained on a large scale, and in an era when inventions are yearly revolutionizing methods of construction, there have not been injudicious expenditures in the river and harbor bills. The waste has not been as great as in other branches of the public service. Many of the most expensive ships built for our Navy, constructed according to the best models of the time, are now rusting away at wharves, utterly useless to-day, though costing millions. The navy of Great Britain, designed in accordance with the most perfect development of the art of shipbuilding, numbers in the admiralty list useless hulks which cost millions of pounds.

The accusation of extravagance in these expenditures for rivers and harbors is effectually disproved by a comparison with the methods of other nations of more developed resources. England and France illustrate two widely different lines of policy in the provision made for aids to commerce and transportation. In Great Britain these improvements are for the most part undertaken by private corporations or agencies other than the Imperial Government. These enterprises have been undertaken upon an enormous scale. Undoubtedly more capital is invested there in harbors, docks, and inland waterways than in any other country. In recent years the Tyne, at and below Newcastle, has been deepened and other improvements made at a cost of $20,000,000. On the Mersey and the Clyde much larger sums have been expended. The Manchester Canal, 35½ miles in length, has recently been completed at a cost of $75,000,000. In other private canal companies $150,000,000 is invested. This method of improvement by private corporations or local authorities is not suited to our methods, or, especially in the case of inland waterways, to the greater extent of territory involved in each improvement.

It is true that plausible arguments have been made for the adoption of a system in this country under which a fraction—say one-third or one-fourth—of the expense of river and harbor improvements should be paid by local authorities or collected from the locality regarded as especially benefited and the balance by the General Government. It is maintained by the advocates of this plan, that this division would secure a more equitable adjustment of the burden of the expense and assure good faith and the exercise of the best judgment in the adoption of projects for improvement. The objections are that all these projects have come to be regarded as distinctly national in their character and not to be undertaken unless proper subjects of expenditure from the national Treasury; that the necessity of including different localities and States in a single improvement would require a concert of action by numerous and perhaps varying interests, almost impossible to obtain; and further, that less deserving projects would be presented, with offers to furnish the portion to be paid by local taxation, and these would obtain recognition to the exclusion of more valuable projects for which less pecuniary support could be furnished. The tendency of legislation on this subject from the time when Madison, in 1817, declared he found no warrant in the Constitution for expenditures for internal improvements has been for the General Government to undertake these improvements and provide for the payment of the whole expense in case the direct and principal result is to aid commerce, but to require of local authorities a share of the expense when, as in the case of the levees along the Mississippi River, particular localities receive, in protection to property or otherwise, a benefit distinct from that obtained from improved facilities for navigation.

In assistance rendered by the Government to harbors and to inland navigation, the nation with which comparison can most aptly be made is France. In the United States the total of appropriations made for rivers and harbors since the formation of the Government, including amounts appropriated for continuing contracts under the sundry civil bill, is $273,638,515. France, in the period from 1814 to 1894, inclusive, for which carefully prepared statistics are available, has made expenditures for the betterment of inland waterways and for ports, appearing on the budget in two forms—first, "travaux extraordinaires," improvements and additions intended to be permanent, which when complete will not require to be renewed; second, "travaux ordinaires," expenses of annual occurrence, for care and maintenance, in which are sometimes included branches and permanent improvements of minor importance.

Under the first, or permanent class, there has been expended by France in the eighty-one years mentioned approximately $500,000,000, of which the sum of $300,000,000 has been for rivers and canals, inland navigation, and $200,000,000 for ports and harbors.

Under the second head of "Care and maintenance," which, equally with the former, should be counted in order to make an accurate comparison, there has been expended in the same time, approximately, $135,000,000 for inland navigation and $70,000,000 for ports and harbors, making a total for both classes of expenditure, in round numbers, of $435,000,000 for inland navigation and $270,000,000 for harbors; in all, $705,000,000. It will thus appear that the amount expended by France has been more than two and one-half times as great as that expended in this country, yet a single State in this Union has a greater area than all of France. Equally significant is a comparison of individual projects and localities. Upon the River Seine alone, for a distance of less than 250 miles, between Paris and Havre, there has been expended 61,000,000 of francs, or about $12,000,000, an amount nearly equal to the total amount appropriated by this Government for the improvement of the Ohio and all its branches, excluding the Cumberland and Tennessee. Yet these rivers have a length of 4,406 miles of navigable water, and in the valley of the Ohio, including the Monongahela, Allegheny, Muskingum, Great and Little Kanawha, Kentucky, Green, and other tributaries, there is an empire as rich in its resources as any equal body of land in the world.

Even more impressive is the contrast when we compare expenditures for harbors. The port of Boston, the second ocean port of the United States, has received in appropriations, from the beginning, from the General Government, $2,804,000. The port of New York, for the divers improvements included in the harbor and neighboring channels, comprising all expenses from and including Sandy Hook on the one side to and including the Harlem River on the other, has received $8,449,911. The cities of Buffalo and Chicago, located upon the Great Lakes, and second and third among American ports in amount of tonnage entering and clearing, have received in appropriations, respectively, $2,861,480.41 and $2,272,400 (including Calumet). The city of Cleveland, the leading shipowning and shipbuilding port of the Great Lakes, has received $1,647,994.84. Yet on the single port of Havre, not the greatest port of France, there was expended from 1814 to 1891, the last year for which official figures for separate harbors are available, a sum slightly in excess of $32,000,000; on the harbor of Marseilles, $19,000,000; on that of Dunkirk, $20,000,000. Yet each of these ports, with the exception of Marseilles, has, in tonnage, a traffic less than the least of the American ports mentioned. More in detail, the expenditures for improvements in France for the period mentioned, 1814 to 1894, inclusive, expressed in French money, have been as follows:

		Francs.
For inland navigation—
Rivers:
Extraordinaires	635,051,827
Ordinaires	404,513,274
Total for rivers		1,039,565,101
Canals:
Extraordinaires	839,201,789
Ordinaires	271,188,244
Total for canals		1,110,390,033
Total for inland navigation		2,149,955,134
For ports and harbors (maritime:)—
Extraordinaires	992,728,607
Ordinaires	347,460,428
Total for ports and harbors		1,340,189,035
Grand total		3,490,144,169

Of this amount 111,048,235 francs was for light-houses, beacons, buoys, etc., the management of which in this country is under the Treasury Department, although these amounts are properly chargeable to appropriations for purposes of navigation. But, on the other hand, in addition to the expenditures above, something over 140,000,000 francs was expended for reparation of improvements and the acquisition of canals, etc. The latter was charged to the military establishment, though really expended for navigation. For maintenance and dredging, etc., in the years 1836 to 1876, inclusive, there was expended for rivers as follows:

	Francs.
The Garonne	22,084,669
The Rhine	25,335,358
The Loire	30,469,122
The Rhone	32,137,674

The exact expenditure on the harbors named, to and including 1891, was as follows:

	Francs.
Havre	163,324,988
Dunkirk	104,000,000
Marseilles	94,953,931

The public men and economists of France are practically unanimous in the opinion that these expenditures have been of the greatest benefit to the whole country, and that the amounts required should be supplied by national taxation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

On motion of Mr. HOOKER, unanimous consent was given for general leave to extend in the RECORD remarks made upon this bill.

[Mr. WASHINGTON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I think it is now time that the gentleman in charge of the opposition, Mr. DOCKERY, should occupy some of his time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] is recognized to control the time in opposition to the motion.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of just and proper appropriations for the improvement of the great rivers and waterways of the country; but I am not in favor of a policy which, in order to secure that desirable result, compels us to appropriate for unimportant creeks and streams. Mr. Speaker, I would not favor the passage of this bill, even though I approved every line of it, under a suspension of the rules, which forbids the right of amendment and limits all debate to forty minutes.

I know the suggestion has been made—and possibly it explains the appearance of this bill to-day, clamoring for passage under suspension of the rules—that it is not safe to trust this body, because of the apprehension that the bill, if considered in the ordinary way, would be largely increased in its items and aggregate.

It may be that this is a correct view of the situation; I do not positively assert that it is not. But I insist, Mr. Speaker, that any bill imposing upon the people of the United States direct appropriations exceeding $10,000,000 and liabilities in other forms in excess of $51,000,000 should be considered by the representatives of the people under the five-minute rule, which permits debate and amendment. The bill as reported to the House carries in direct appropriations $10,330,560. The chairman of the committee advises me that the committee has added by way of amendments $97,000 additional, thus swelling the total of direct appropriation to $10,427,560. The bill also authorizes contracts amounting to $51,721,210.91, making a grand total of liabilities upon the Treasury of $62,148,770.91. This becomes, therefore, the largest river and harbor bill known to our constitutional history.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must hurry on, because other gentlemen wish to be heard. I desire, however, to refer for just a moment to the history of the contract system. It had its origin in the Fiftieth Congress, when an appropriation was made for the construction of the building for the Library of Congress and contracts authorized to be made in excess of the amount appropriated. I am advised by a gentleman who is well informed that this was the first appearance of the contract system upon our statutes. The precedent thus established was followed by the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses. The Fifty-first Congress authorized five contracts for river and harbor improvements, and, in addition to an appropriation of $2,340,000, fixed the limit of the cost of such improvements at $13,282,980, making the total of appropriations and liabilities for the Congress $15,622,980. The Fifty-second Congress followed with the authorization of thirteen contracts, in which authority was given to impose upon the Government contract liabilities amounting to $31,760,521; so that the total of appropriations and of contracts authorized by the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses under this system was $47,383,501. The Fifty-third Congress declined to authorize any new contracts for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will, if the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. HOPKINS. Has not experience shown that the contract system of doing public work is a measure of economy to the General Government?

Mr. DOCKERY. Undoubtedly, as to any given work, it is more businesslike and more economical to apply the contract system. But it is obvious, from the figures I have submitted, that whenever we enter upon the policy of giving the note or obligation of the Government instead of the cash it results in the imposition of increased liabilities.

Mr. HOPKINS. Right there, allow me another question.

Mr. DOCKERY. In a moment. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, in these two Congresses the liabilities were $47,383,501. The precedent established by the Fiftieth Congress is to be followed in this Congress by authorizing thirty-two new contracts, the limit of cost being $51,721,210.91. I will now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is it not a fact that in this appropriation bill no contract is provided for except as to works for which appropriations have heretofore been made?

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not advised on that point; but if the gentleman so states, I assume that he is correct.

Mr. HOPKINS. And the contracts authorized by the present bill run, some of them, for six years, do they not?

Mr. DOCKERY. I think they do.

Mr. HOPKINS. So that when the gentleman says that these expenditures will amount to something more than $50,000,000, it makes the annual appropriation less than $10,000,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is conceded that the contract system, in so far as a given work is concerned, is more economical; but the result of the system is manifest in this bill. While it is true that members secure small appropriations because of the present condition of the Treasury, yet it is also true that under this system the revenues of the future are mortgaged; so that while in individual cases the contract system operates in the interest of economy, yet the net result as shown by the aggregate is an enormous increase of the liabilities of the Government.

Mr. HOPKINS. I deny in toto the gentleman's conclusions, and state broadly and unqualifiedly that the result of this system is economy not only in the particular cases, but in the general result.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not know how the gentleman reaches his conclusions.

Mr. HOPKINS. On facts.

Mr. DOCKERY. I know that more than eighteen hundred years ago there were "doubting Thomases"; and it is said that there were those then who would not believe "though one rose from the dead."

Mr. MERCER. How do you know? [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not surprised, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER] should exhibit such a lack of familiarity with the Sacred Book.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are facts; they are figures taken from the official records, showing that this bill carries more than sixty-two millions of obligations which must be met by the taxpayers of the country, and yet it is to be crowded through the House under a suspension of the rules, without the right of amendment and with but twenty minutes' debate on either side. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the passage of this bill because of its exorbitant demands upon the Treasury. Its passage under a suspension of the rules is without precedent as to this bill in recent years and should invite the condemnation of the country.

Mr. Speaker, what time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

[Mr. WHEELER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as we have exhausted about half of our time, I ask the gentleman from Missouri to occupy a portion of his.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri has ten minutes, the gentleman from New York twelve, remaining.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield nine minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

[Mr. HEPBURN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HOOKER. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS].

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, before attempting to make some reply to the extraordinary harangue with which we have been honored by our distinguished friend [Mr. HEPBURN], I desire to say that I have served on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors ever since my entrance into Congress. No river and harbor appropriation bill has been framed during the last ten years in whose construction I did not actively participate. I want to say here now, in all frankness and candor, that the bill which the committee have presented to the House on this occasion is by all odds the most carefully drawn, the most scientific in its construction, and will redound most to the benefit of the country of any bill which has ever passed since I have been in Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, my friend Mr. HEPBURN always indulges in great poetic license when he assails the Mississippi River. I wish to call him down upon his statement that two-thirds of all the money which has been appropriated for that river has been expended in the construction of levees. I say to him now that eleven millions of the twenty-six millions have gone into the construction of levees along the banks of that river. I wish also to say to him that during the same time the riparian owners, of their own means, have expended the enormous sum of $14,000,000, so that the work has gone along by a system of cooperation between the Federal Government and the riparian owners. I wish also to remind the gentleman of a fact which he well knows—for he has made a great study of this question, having fought it whenever it was presented for consideration—that the Board of Army Engineers appointed in 1879 to consider this question reported that it was absolutely essential, if there was to be any navigation of that stream during its flood period, that these levees should be constructed; that without confining the flood there could be no commerce upon the river, there could be no navigation, no places for the boats to land, no commerce for them to engage in if they could land. So that constructing the levees has had the specific purpose of enabling those who would use that river to navigate it and transact their business upon it in its periods of greatest flood.

So far as concerns the lower water navigation of the river, I wish to say that the work has not progressed as rapidly as we had expected, because the contraction and revetment works have turned out to be more expensive than the engineers at their inception expected that they would be; but during the last few years there has been a most tremendous development of what is known as the hydraulic dredge, which was invented in 1854, but which was never practically utilized on any public works until between 1890 and 1892. But it has now reached that point of magnificent performance where we have a dredge now constructed which on a test a few weeks ago removed the enormous and unprecedented amount of 6,700 cubic yards per hour. The commission is providing a fleet of just such dredges for the purpose of dredging these sand bars and affording navigation during the low period of the river, and this bill especially requires that so much of the money as shall be necessary shall be expended in the way of obtaining a channel 9 feet deep from St. Louis to the Gulf, not less than 250 feet wide.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question there?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is not this very dredging an abandonment of every scheme which has heretofore been formed and a return to the old methods before the Commission was created?

Mr. CATCHINGS. No, sir; the gentleman does not know what he is talking about. [Applause.] There has never been a dredge boat along the Lower Mississippi River, and removing sand bars until within the last few years by dredging would have been an impossibility. There never was the possibility of dredging a sand bar on the lower river until this hydraulic system was discovered, and if my friend knew anything of this subject, about which he declaims so vigorously, he would know that what I say is absolutely true.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the people of all the Western States have flocked before our committee and demanded that this appropriation should go on. There is nothing in this bill more meritorious or more worthy of the respect and favor of the House. We all agree with Henry Clay, who declared more than forty years ago that if there was any one thing national in its character, it was the great Mississippi River. And we also know that that other great distinguished statesman, John C. Calhoun, departed from his ordinary position in reference to the power of the Government to make internal improvements and favored this, because he said that it was just what we all know it to be—a great inland sea.

Mr. Speaker, I beg this House to pay little heed to what the gentleman from Iowa has said, as he has opposed every river and harbor bill, and never has voted for one, and never will, because of his prejudices, notwithstanding his protestations.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield one minute to the gentleman from California.

Mr. McLACHLAN. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from New York, to suspend the rules and pass this bill, for the reason that if this course is pursued it will give no opportunity to anyone to offer any amendments to this important measure, making appropriations aggregating over $60,000,000 of the people's money, including the continuous contracts provided for therein. I assume that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have faith in the justice and merits of the bill that it has presented here to-day, and, if I am right in this assumption, that committee can surely have no valid objection to submitting their labors and conclusions to the deliberate judgment of this House and give us a reasonable opportunity to investigate them for ourselves.

The members of this committee will not claim to be infallible, or assume that their judgment upon many features of this bill is superior to that of the whole House. This bill is far from being satisfactory to me or the people whom I represent. San Pedro Harbor, the point in my district where two great transcontinental railroads touch tide water on the Pacific coast, has received the most miserly consideration at the hands of this committee, notwithstanding the most reasonable demands that we made of it; and I now urge you to defeat this resolution to suspend the rules and pass this bill, so that I may have an opportunity to present to this House the merits of our claim for San Pedro and southern California. Having had an opportunity to do that, I must be satisfied with the result. But if this resolution prevails I will have no opportunity to present our case to the House, and must submit to the wrong perpetrated by this committee against an improvement that deserves far better consideration than it has received at the hands of the committee. There are other localities that have similar grievances against the provisions of this bill, and we simply demand an opportunity to be heard. This is reasonable; this is just.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, in the half minute remaining I only desire the attention of members while I make one suggestion. If you desire to offer amendments, the way to secure such right is to vote down the motion to suspend the rules, and then the bill will come up in the usual way in which it has always been considered in recent years, and you can offer amendments and have them considered.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question before he sits down. If the gentleman's suggestion were adopted, would he then support the bill? I ask him to answer that question.

Mr. DOCKERY. It would depend upon the condition of the bill when it had been completed. [Cries of "Ah!" and laughter.]

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there remaining on the other side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time on the other side has been consumed, and the gentleman from New York has seven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HOOKER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, against the declamation of my valued colleague from my State, I simply want to state one practical fact, being a practical man. Within ten days the traffic manager of a railway between St. Paul and St. Louis was in my room. I said to him, "Colonel, what is the practical benefit to the people of the Mississippi Valley, from a railroad standpoint, of our Mississippi River improvements." He said, "It amounts to 50 per cent reduction of railroad transportation rates for the Mississippi Valley for a great part of the year." [Great applause.]

Mr. HOOKER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. COLSON].

[Mr. COLSON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. HERMANN].

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, no policy on the part of this Congress has proven so beneficial, so profitable, and so lasting to all parts of this Union and to all its people as the policy of appropriations for liberal waterway improvements. The great problem of the present day is cheaper transportation. Deeper water means deeper draft ships, and deeper draft ships give us greater carrying capacity, and this produces cheaper freights. Ten years ago in the port of Boston no ship of a carrying capacity of 2,500 tons could enter and depart from that port. To-day a vessel carrying 10,000 tons and drawing 30 feet and 6 inches of water can enter and depart without any difficulty; and the testimony is that the reduction of freights amounts to 40 per cent. That has been the result in the last decade.

Now, there is no policy so popular among the American people as these liberal waterway appropriations. A few years ago many Representatives on this floor earned their title to reelection by their opposition to the river and harbor bill; and to-day, sir, that same opposition would result in their defeat. More money is appropriated now in a single bill than was appropriated from the foundation of this Government up to the year 1860. In the decade between 1880 and 1890 we appropriated $108,000,000 for the improvement of the waterways of the United States; yet, liberal as we are in our appropriations for our waterways, our policy is illiberal in comparison with that pursued by foreign nations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I can not, in the time remaining, expect to explain every portion of this bill, but I desire to make a few observations concerning the bill and some of the remarks that have been made by gentlemen who have preceded me. This is not the first time a river and harbor bill has been passed under a suspension of the rule. This is not the first time that my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has made remarks concerning the passage of a large appropriation bill under a suspension of the rules. If I recollect correctly, in the Fifty-third Congress the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, of which the gentleman from Missouri had charge, carrying about $25,000,000, was passed under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, no. I have never had charge of a bill since I have been connected with Congress that passed under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. HOOKER. Well, you were a member of the committee that reported the bill to the House, and that bill was passed without giving an opportunity to debate it for twenty-five minutes, or even for five minutes. So much for that.

I am somewhat surprised at my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] picking up this bill, selecting a few States, calling the attention of the House to them, and saying with a great deal of assurance that the State of Maine gets over $1,000,000 in this bill. When he made that statement he knew well enough that in the appropriation carried for the State of Maine over one and a half millions was placed upon continuous contracts, and that for those two projects only $40,000 in actual cash was appropriated. When he spoke of the appropriation for the State of Massachusetts he knew that in that total there was one item of over a million dollars for the city of Boston, and that there was not a dollar of money in that sum appropriated. He would also have known, had he read the bill, that in the aggregate of the appropriations for the State of New York there were upwards of $4,000,000 placed under the continuous-contract system, one item of which was $2,200,000 for the city of Buffalo, and that there is not one dollar of money appropriated in this bill for that project.

I am not surprised that the gentleman lays so much stress on the Mississippi River appropriation. That has been his hobby ever since I have been in Congress, and it was his hobby long before I came to Congress, and to-day he has not advanced a solitary new argument relative to the matter, and it is strange to me that after his objections have year after year been so completely answered he should now offer them again.

In the Forty-ninth Congress he made a similar fight against the Mississippi River appropriation, and he has continued it ever since while he has been a member of the House. If the gentleman had examined the items in this bill concerning the appropriation for the Mississippi River Commission and the Missouri River Commission he would have discovered that the language of the appropriation in this bill for the Mississippi and the Missouri rivers is almost identical with that of former provisions for those rivers. In other words, in the Fifty-second Congress we appropriated $16,000,000 for the Mississippi River, and under this bill we appropriate only $14,400,000. This bill carries with it in cash items $10,432,560, and authorizes the Secretary of War to enter into contracts for the completion of works to the amount of $51,721,210.91. So I might go through the entire bill.

The committee has been considering the items that make up this bill for three months past. We have listened to representatives of this House and of the Senate from almost every State and Territory in the Union, and of the numerous items in the bill, amounting to about five hundred in number, every one has been considered by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors as a whole, and none of them have been considered by a subcommittee. There are only about twenty-two new projects contained in this bill, and the committee state to the House that there is not a single item, not a single new project, not a single new proposition in this river and harbor bill that has not been debated and legislated upon by Congress in years past, and every item of expenditure is justified by the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOOKER] to suspend the rules and pass this bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore declared that in the opinion of the Chair the ayes had it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 216, noes 40.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HEPBURN. Simply to remark that this vote shows the general evenness with which the "pork" has been distributed. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order. Upon this question the ayes are 216 and the noes are 40——

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, only 26 members voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon this question the ayes are 216 and the noes are 40; two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules are suspended and the bill is passed. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the House now adjourn, if there is nothing else to do.

Mr. LOW addressed the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I withdraw the motion.

LEGALIZING BOND ISSUES IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. LOW. I move to suspend the rules and pass, with the amendments as reported by the Committee on Territories, the bill (H. R. 4052) approving certain acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico authorizing the issue of certain bonds of said Territory.

The bill, with the amendments of the Senate as proposed to be amended by the Committee on the Territories, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the coupon bonds and indebtedness of the Territory of New Mexico, amounting to $75,000, authorized by section 7 of an act of the Thirty-first legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico entitled "An act authorizing the rebuilding of the Territorial capitol at Santa Fe, which was destroyed by fire May 12, 1892, and to provide the necessary means therefor and a board with authority to rebuild the same," approved February 5, 1895, and designated as capitol rebuilding bonds of the Territory of New Mexico;

Also, the bonds and indebtedness, amounting to $15,000, authorized by section 1 of an act of the said legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico entitled "An act to provide for the maintenance of the military institute at Roswell, N. Mex.," approved February 13, 1895.

Also, the bonds and indebtedness, amounting to the sum of $30,000, authorized by section 1 of an act of the said legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico entitled "An act to provide an addition to the insane asylum of New Mexico for the accommodation of all the insane persons of the Territory, and for other purposes," approved May 13, 1895; and

Also, the bonds and indebtedness, amounting to the sum of $35,000, authorized by section 1 of an act of the said legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico entitled "An act to provide for the completion of the buildings for the normal schools of New Mexico at Las Vegas and Silver City, and to provide for the necessary furnishings therefor; and for additions to the New Mexico College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, at Las Cruces," approved February 27, 1895, be, and the same are hereby, approved, confirmed, and made valid; also, the certain bonds and indebtedness, $172,500 in amount, together with the interest coupons thereto attached, of the county of Santa Fe, Territory of New Mexico, dated March 1, 1892, issued under the provisions of an act of the Territorial general assembly known as the refunding act. Such bonds having been issued in refunding and in lieu of $150,000 of bonds, and the overdue interest thereon, of said county of Santa Fe, theretofore issued and outstanding, and hereby validated, approved, and confirmed.

Also the certain bonds and indebtedness, together with interest coupons thereto attached, of the county of Santa Fe, Territory of New Mexico, dated September 29, 1891, issued under the provisions of an act of the Territorial general assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act for the financial relief of counties and municipalities," approved February 26, 1891.

Such bonds having been issued in refunding and in lieu of $150,000 of bonds, overdue interest, and a judgment rendered thereon, of said county of Santa Fe, theretofore, in the year 1880, issued and outstanding, are hereby validated, approved, and confirmed. Also the certain bonds and indebtedness, $56,000 in amount, together with the interest coupons thereto attached, of the county of Grant, Territory of New Mexico, dated July 1, 1883, being the unretired part of an issue of $60,000 in bonds issued by said county of Grant under the provisions of an act of the Territorial general assembly dated February 1, 1872, are hereby validated, approved, and confirmed. Also the certain bonds and indebtedness, $50,000 in amount, together with the interest coupons thereto attached, of the city of Silver City, county of Grant, Territory of New Mexico, dated March 1, 1893, issued under the provisions of an act of the Territorial general assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act enabling the authorities having charge of the finances of any town or city of the Territory of New Mexico to refund any bonds or other obligations of said town or city by the issuance of similar obligations bearing a less rate of interest," approved February 11, 1891. Such bonds having been issued in refunding and in lieu of bonds and indebtedness to the amount of $50,000 of said city of Silver City, county of Grant, theretofore issued and outstanding, are hereby validated, approved, and confirmed.

It is intended hereby to validate, approve, and confirm any and all laws, ordinances, and proceedings, and bonds relating to the matter necessary to the validation of the said Santa Fe County, Grant County, and town of Silver City bonds, but no further and for no other purpose.

The said county of Santa Fe is hereby authorized and empowered to again refund all or any portion of the indebtedness thereof by this act validated within one year from the passage of this act, in accordance with the terms and provisions of an act of the legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, being chapter 79, entitled "An act for the financial relief of counties and municipalities" (House bill No. 192), approved February 26, 1891, except that such refunded bonds shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and shall become due twenty-five years from the date of the issue of such refunded bonds, and shall be issued for the amount of unpaid principal of the bonds of said county by this act validated, with interest thereon from the date thereof, to wit, September, 1891, and March, 1892, respectively, at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until the date when the sum shall be refunded as herein provided, less the amount of interest heretofore paid on such bonds; and when said bonds shall be so refunded they shall be subject in all other respects to all the provisions, liabilities, rights, obligations, benefits, and advantages of said act of the legislature herein referred to. In case said bonds shall not be refunded by said county of Santa Fe upon the terms and conditions in this section set forth, then the bonds validated by this act shall remain as the legal obligation of said Santa Fe County.

If said bonds shall be refunded as herein provided, the holders of the bonds herein validated shall, upon actual notice given by said county, deliver to said county the bonds herein validated, and shall receive in lieu thereof the refunded bonds provided for in this section: Provided, That any of said bonds which shall not be delivered for refunding to said county of Santa Fe within six months after said notice shall be given, as herein required, shall not bear a rate of interest greater than 4 per cent per annum from date of issue: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to make the Government of the United States liable or responsible for the payment of any of said bonds by this act approved, confirmed, and made valid.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act approving certain acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, authorizing the issue of certain bonds of said Territory, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill as proposed to be amended.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. On that motion I demand a second.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I object.

Mr. LOW and Mr. COOPER of Texas having been appointed as tellers, the House divided on the question of seconding the motion for the previous question; and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 1.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LOW] is recognized for twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER] will be recognized for the same time, if he desires it.

Mr. LOW. As my distinguished associate on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OWENS], is thoroughly conversant with all the legal points of this question, as well as eminently qualified to answer any inquiries which members may desire to make, I yield to him.

Mr. OWENS. A short statement of the history of this matter will perhaps furnish the best explanation that I can give.

Some time ago the House passed a bill validating certain bonds which had been issued by different counties and municipalities in the Territory of New Mexico. Certain informalities had arisen, and some question was raised in regard to the validity of those bonds, and it was deemed proper to pass the House bill in order to remove those doubts. When the bill went to the Senate, that body added provisions covering certain other bonds issued some years ago by the county of Sante Fe, I believe, in the Territory of New Mexico, to provide for the construction of a railroad across that county. Those bonds had been issued and turned over to the railroad company. The company put the bonds on the market and disposed of them to holders who had no further notice, I presume, of the terms under which they had been issued than the law itself prescribed. These bonds, I may say, were issued in perfect good faith by the people of that county, who received for them a full and valuable consideration. No objection was raised by the people of the county to the payment of the bonds or any part of them. For a number of years the interest accruing on the bonds (something like 10 per cent, I believe) was paid by those people. After a number of years those bonds, by agreement with the holders, were refunded at about 7 per cent.

Some years later, upon a case arising in the courts of Arizona, it was judicially held that bonds such as these had not been issued in compliance with law, or, rather, they did not fall under the terms or spirit of the law under which they were supposed to have been issued. That law provided for issuing bonds for the purpose of making internal improvements in the Territories; and the court decided that a railroad did not fall within the description of internal improvements. After that decision the county of Santa Fe refused to pay the bonds. The amendment to the bill was passed by the Senate in order to cure that defect in the issue of those bonds, and to enable the holders, who had paid par and sometimes more than par value for them, to collect their money. Now, the question presented by this bill when returned to the House was whether or not we should concur in the Senate amendments validating the bonds issued in the manner I have described.

When the question was referred to the Committee on the Territories, two other sets of bonds came before that committee—the Grant County bonds and the Silver City bonds—which had been issued under somewhat similar circumstances, if not precisely similar, the Grant County bonds amounting to $56,000 and the Silver City bonds to $50,000. As I have already said, the conditions under which they were issued were nearly, if not precisely, similar, and there was no question of the validity of any of the bonds and no allegation on the part of the counties and cities that they would not pay them, and no question as to their legality in any respect until this decision in the Arizona case, after which they, in turn, declined to pay the interest upon the bonds; and this question is now presented to Congress, whether or not it will oblige them to do so, or allow these counties and municipalities to escape the payments of the obligations that are conceded on all hands to be of binding moral force.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. OWENS. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Were the Silver City and Grant County bonds ever refunded?

Mr. OWENS. Yes, sir; they have been, as I understand.

The purpose of the House bill, I will say to the gentleman—that is, the House amendment to the Senate amendment—is that all these bonds may be refunded, and that was agreed to, I think, by the holders of the bonds and the Territorial representative of the Territory before the committee, all of them conceding that these bonds should be refunded at 4 per cent.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Pardon me—my question was, had the Silver City bonds and the Grant County bonds been refunded before the decision was made in the case to which the gentleman refers, in Arizona?

Mr. OWENS. That is my recollection. They had all been put on the market in good faith, with the fullest and most satisfactory assurances from all parties that they would be paid at maturity. The courts of New Mexico had passed on a number of the bonds and said they were issued in compliance with the conditions of the law and were regular in all respects, and on that assurance the people all over the country, I know not who they were, but in all parts of the country, invested their money in the bonds on the faith of the assurances given to them that they would be paid. They were regarded as a very good investment. The men who appeared before our committee, those in favor of the proposition and those against it, for arguments were heard on both sides, were unable to discover or present a single equity as to why these bonds should not be paid or why these people should not be forced to pay them.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. OWENS. Certainly.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Is there anything to show how much of interest is to be funded and how much represents the principal of the indebtedness? We find no report accompanying this matter.

Mr. OWENS. There is a lengthy statement of the committee accompanying the bill. There is nothing, I will state to the gentleman, to show, although the greater part of the interest has already been paid. There was no complaint for many years after the issuance of the bonds about the interest being paid, and there was no question then raised as to the validity of the bonds. They did in fact keep up the payment of the interest for a number of years, and that was continued until after the decision in the Arizona case, to which I have already referred. I do not think it can involve a very large amount as far as the interest is concerned, at least it does not cover a very considerable period of time.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Is there any report from the governor or the officials of the Territory recommending this legislation?

Mr. OWENS. No; I am sorry to say that the governor of New Mexico was before the committee and endeavored to prevent the passage of this legislation.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Why is the gentleman "sorry to say" it?

Mr. OWENS. Because in doing so, when he appeared before the committee, he failed to disclose, so far as my judgment is concerned, a single fact why the people of New Mexico should be allowed to escape the just and moral obligations in which they are involved by the issuance of the bonds.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. Let me ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether the governor, in his appearance before the committee, set up the charge that there had been fraud in connection with this matter or that these bonds had been issued improperly?

Mr. OWENS. No such charge was made, so far as I am aware. There had been some pretense, or talk, I should say, of some irregularity on the part of the officials of that county, of the extent of which the people who purchased the bonds could have no possible notice.

Mr. LACEY. Did not the governor, let me ask the gentleman, as a member of the Board of Trade of Santa Fe, sign a written recommendation that these bonds afforded a safe and reliable investment?

Mr. OWENS. Yes, sir; the whole board of trade of the city signed an indorsement in the most unequivocal terms that these bonds were just and binding obligations, and would be fully met and paid.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Has there been anywhere a suit to test the validity of the bonds and the manner of their issuance?

Mr. OWENS. There was, and the courts of New Mexico reached the determination that the bonds were regular, legal, and valid in every particular, and no question arose, as I have already stated, until after the decision in the Arizona case.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Then, again, let me ask the gentleman, does this increase the indebtedness of the Territory of New Mexico in excess of the amount allowed by the Harrison Act, passed some years ago, which restricted the indebtedness to 5 per cent, I believe it was, of the value of the assessed property?

Mr. OWENS. I am not sure of that; I think it unlikely, although in the case of Santa Fe County it will probably increase the amount of the indebtedness of that county somewhat in excess of the requirement of that act. But it strikes me, whether it does or not, that these people, after putting these bonds on the market, and after having voted two or three times to do so, should not be allowed to escape the payment of the bonds, which were purchased in good faith by investors, no charge of improper conduct being raised.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. OWENS. Certainly.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Is not the invalidity of these bonds due to the fact that they are an issue in excess of the 5 per cent limit allowed by law?

Mr. OWENS. No; not under the decision of the court. It was put on this ground, that the act provided for the issuing of these bonds for internal improvements, and the court, in the Arizona case, determined that the construction of railroads was not an internal improvement, and that the purpose of these bonds did not fall within the terms of the act under which they were issued.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether in these suits to which he has referred the defenses set up were based upon any allegation of fraud against these bonds?

Mr. OWENS. No; I think not.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. Or that their inception was in fraud?

Mr. OWENS. I could not say. I am not familiar with all these defenses; but I know there was a determination reached by the decision of the court that the bonds were valid in every particular.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the House has determined to consider this matter at present. Should it pass this bill, I think a very dangerous precedent would be established. As a member of the committee I have had the matter under examination. I had not the slightest idea that it would be called up for consideration to-day, because it was generally known to my colleagues on the committee that I was examining into this matter, and I expected, if the convictions I now entertain were supported by the facts and the law, to file a minority report.

The facts in this case are these: Originally a bill was introduced in Congress providing for the validation of certain bonds that were not yet issued—bonds of the Territory of New Mexico providing for the establisment of some eleemosynary and Territorial public institutions. These bonds could not be issued, because their issue would be in conflict with a law of the United States. We undertook to pass remedial legislation here for the benefit of that Territory. This bill passed the House and went to the Senate, and there some railroad bonds were attached to it by amendment. The Senate attempted to validate the bonds commonly known as the "Brice bonds." This bill came back to the House with that amendment attached to it. It was referred to the Committee on Territories, and there they undertook, by amendment, to validate nearly $400,000 more of railroad bonds that had been issued by certain counties of New Mexico; in one instance, bonds that had been purchased by some agent or broker named Coler, and known as the "Coler bonds," which originally amounted to $150,000, but in the refunding act you find that after having been refunded they amount to $250,000.

The gentleman says that there is no fraud charged in the issuance of these bonds. We had the governor of New Mexico before the committee. We had a telegram sent to the committee by a mass meeting of citizens of Santa Fe, N. Mex., protesting against the legalizing of these bonds and making an allegation of fraud. An examination of the records will show that the tax rolls were padded; that property had been placed upon those rolls that was not subject to taxation; that railroad property that was then exempt from taxation under the laws of New Mexico was put upon the rolls for the purpose of giving sufficient valuation to authorize the issue of these bonds. Those rolls increased in a few years from a little over $2,000,000 to over $6,000,000, and directly after the issuance of these bonds, or the authorization of them, the amount decreased again to $3,000,000. I say to you further, if it is right that these bonds should be validated—that we should assume the guardianship of the acts of that Territory—why does not the gentleman who represents that Territory here demand it. He has not been asking it. New Mexico has a representative upon this floor, and he has not demanded the passage of this bill.

Another badge of fraud, or a thing that gives semblance of it, at least, is this: You find that at one election which they held in 12 precincts only 6 precincts cast any votes, and 141 votes in that county placed the bond burden upon the people of that county. You find that when they undertook to refund these bonds some of them were refunded into gold bonds. They were originally coin bonds, or payable in the lawful money of this country. Some of them have been refunded and are payable in gold. You find, furthermore, that the law authorizing the refunding of these bonds will show in itself that there was some overriding power which put the law upon the statute books in the interest of the bondholders. To show you how severe this law is, I will state that it provides that if the tax collector fails or refuses to collect the money and make payment that he shall be sent to the penitentiary and forever debarred from holding office. They do not allow him to go to the courts. The law undertakes to tie the hands of the officers, so that they can not go to the courts and resist the payment of these debts.

Now, as far as the suit about these bonds is concerned, let me tell you something about that. There was a suit entered upon these bonds in the Territorial courts of New Mexico. That suit went to the supreme court of the Territory. A majority of the court decided in favor of the bonds, but there was a very able dissenting opinion. Parties undertook to carry, by appeal, that case to the Supreme Court of the United States. Citizens proposed to take the necessary steps to carry the suit to the Supreme Court of the United States, but the commissioners refused to allow them to do so, notwithstanding they proposed to do it without cost to the county.

The Supreme Court of the United States has never had an opportunity to pass upon this. It has passed upon the case in Arizona of Lewis against Pima County, and in that case the court held the Territory had no authority to issue these bonds. If gentlemen want these bonds restored, if the holders want these bonds validated, why do they not go to the legislative branch of New Mexico? Why not go to the lawmaking power of that Territory, instead of coming here and asking Congress to validate these bonds? Why not offer a law here stating that the legislative assembly of New Mexico shall have power to validate these bonds, if she wants to do so, instead of having us say that Congress shall order that these bonds shall be paid?

Another feature of the law under which these were issued is this: It was contemplated under the law that the counties which issued railroad bonds should have a certain amount of stock in the railroad, and also that those bonds should not be sold for less than par. We had the testimony before the committee that these bonds were sold for about 50 cents on the dollar. We had testimony before that committee, too——

Mr. OWENS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question in that connection?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I yield for a question.

Mr. OWENS. The gentleman says that the law stated that these bonds should be issued at par, and that the testimony shows that they were sold for less than par. Is it not a fact that when they were sold for 50 cents it was by private parties, after these bonds had passed from the possession of the county—after the county had turned them over, and they did not then belong to the county?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. These parties were representatives of the railroad company. The county did not receive any stock in this road. That provision can be found in the law. What its purpose was I do not know; but it stated in the law that the bonds should not be sold for less than par.

Mr. OWENS. Just one county sold them.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The law contemplated that the county which issued them should get stock, and they did not except in one instance. I believe it was Grant County.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Was the stock ever worth anything?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I do not know. Now, these are some of the facts in connection with this. I am willing that this Territory should pay its honest debts. I yield precedence to no man on this floor about wishing to see fairness, justice, and honesty dealt out by the States, Territories, and citizens of this country; and I would have been glad that this bill should have been deferred until this matter had been examined. I have none of the law authorities here, and I could cite a number of cases. I have not the hearings before the committee with me; and have not even the reports of the committee. And here, without warning, without notice, it seems to me, the disposition appears to be to take advantage of the situation and put upon this Territory a debt of more than $500,000, and then they attach this amendment to an innocent bill that provides for the issuance of bonds to pay for the building of the institutions of the Territory.

Mr. Speaker, I warn members to look into this matter carefully, and I ask them not to rush into it; and if they will postpone the consideration of this matter until it can be examined, I would not hesitate or object to any action this House might then take.

I reserve the balance of my time. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. LOW and Mr. KNOX rose.

Mr. LOW. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. KNOX. I thought I could be recognized in my own right.

The SPEAKER. Debate is limited to forty minutes, twenty minutes under the control of the mover and the remaining twenty minutes under the control of the member who demanded a second.

Mr. LOW. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, the proposition here is a simple one, and was investigated carefully by the Committee on Territories. In my opinion, it is perfectly proper for this House to validate these bonds. Now, the proposition in Santa Fe County, N. Mex., was that if a certain railroad should be built the county would grant a certain amount of bonds. The road was constructed in good faith and the county issued the bonds. These are known as the Coler bonds. Then Mr. Coler, of New York, visited Santa Fe and made an examination as to the validity and sale of these bonds. The Board of Trade of Santa Fe issued to him at that time a circular, in which they said:

> We, the undersigned, members of the Santa Fe Board of Trade, and taxpayers of Santa Fe County, respectfully represent that the issue of $150,000 in Santa Fe County bonds, issued in 1880 to aid in the construction of the Santa Fe, New Mexico and Southern Railroad, affords a safe and reliable investment. * * *

These bonds were purchased and sold and scattered throughout the country. Now, then, some years later the county defaulted upon its interest, and suit was brought in the Territorial court. The Supreme Court upheld the validity of these bonds; and the reason this sum of $150,000, which is——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOW. I desire that gentlemen on the other side should occupy some of their time.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to suspending the rules for the purpose of passing this bill at the present time. I requested the gentleman who made this motion not to press it at this time, because I understood that some information is expected from the governor of New Mexico in regard to these bonds which ought to be laid before the House. The report of the committee states that the amendment is what has been agreed upon between the bondholders and myself. In that regard the report is slightly in error, at least it does not state the whole fact. I was opposed in the committee to making these amendments to the original bill, for the reason that I did not consider them germane to the subject of the bill. I saw, however, that the committee were inclined to place upon the bill these amendments, and then I agreed with the parties who were asking for the amendments that if the bill was to be amended so as to validate these additional bonds it should be done by virtue of the amendment as it is presented here; that is, that that should be the condition of things in case anything should be done about those bonds; but I objected to the amendment itself because it was not germane to the original bill.

The original bill provided for the validation of certain bonds of the Territory of New Mexico which had been authorized to be issued, but which never had been issued. They were bonds for the reconstruction of the capitol building, for certain educational institutions, for an asylum for the insane, and for a military institute. Those bonds are waiting to be issued, and for that reason we are anxious to have the bill as orginally introduced passed, but at the present time I do not think the rules ought to be suspended for the purpose of passing this bill with the amendment, as other information in regard to these particular bonds is expected from the Territory of New Mexico immediately after the arrival of Governor Thornton at Santa Fe. Having said so much, and asking that the rules be not suspended in order to pass this bill at present, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. LOW. Would the gentleman on the other side [Mr. COOPER of Texas] like to occupy the rest of his time now?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Will the gentleman please ascertain how much time he has remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LOW] has six minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER] has seven.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SHAW].

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, this seems to me to be a very important matter. I have before me an opinion written by the Supreme Court of the United States in a bond case from my own State. The opinion has been rendered very recently, and I have not had time to examine it, but I think it may have some bearing upon this bill. A number of years ago the legislature of my State caused to be issued a great number of bonds, which were bought up, as I understand, by bona fide purchasers. It was ascertained later that those bonds had been issued by a fraudulent proceeding, and the Supreme Court have held that the matter ought to have been first determined by the supreme court of the State, and that, not having been properly determined there, it can not now be taken up by the Supreme Court of the United States. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the consideration of the pending bill ought to be continued until there can be an examination into the question whether or not there was any fraud in issuing these bonds.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman will allow me, these bonds were adjudicated in the Territorial court, in the supreme court of the Territory, and there is no question of fraud in the issuance of the bonds; none whatever, but under the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Arizona case, holding that the act of 1878 did not authorize the issuance of these bonds, some people there, after having paid interest on the bonds for ten and thirteen years, seem now disposed to take advantage of that decision to repudiate the debt.

Mr. HULICK. Before we vote I should like to ask one question. Was the question of fraud raised in the litigation?

Mr. PERKINS. Not at all.

Mr. HULICK. Or was it only a legal question as to the right to issue the bonds?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. SHAW. No, sir. I have only one minute. All I have to say is this, that the motion now made to suspend the rules and pass this bill clearly ignores the Supreme Court of the United States, before which the question ought to have been brought in some way, and if this course of legislation is to be followed, then, standing here as a Representative of North Carolina, I do not know how soon a bill may be introduced making valid about $35,000,000 of fraudulent bonds in my State.

Mr. OWENS. Does not the gentleman know that there is a distinction between validating a State bond and a Territorial bond? How could Congress validate a State bond?

Mr. SHAW. I understand that, but I learn that this question was not adjudicated in the Territorial court, which court has, as I understand it, the same jurisdiction relative to Territorial matters as the supreme court of a State has over its matters.

Mr. OWENS. It has been in the Territorial court.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that this is too important a piece of legislation to be rushed through under a suspension of the rules. Not one member in twenty on this floor understands the purport of this bill. We have heard from the representative of New Mexico here [Mr. CATRON] that he does not approve of this legislation——

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman ought not to say that.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I can not yield, Mr. Speaker; I have only four minutes. The original bill simply provided for validating bonds that have not yet been issued, bonds to provide for the restoration of the capitol building of New Mexico, which was burned two or three years ago, and for one or two other purposes. If this bill stopped there, there would be no objection to it; but now it is proposed to validate by act of Congress other bonds issued by certain counties and cities of New Mexico to aid in the construction of railroads. The validity of those bonds has never been tested beyond some of the local Territorial courts. Now, I do not see why this House should be in a hurry to rush to the rescue of the people who hold those railroad bonds. They bought them several years ago, bearing on their face 10 per cent interest. The bonds have been refunded once, and the citizens upon whose shoulders the obligation must rest, who will have to pay these bonds if we pass this bill, are not here demanding that they shall be validated.

I have never seen a holder of railroad bonds who was not able to take care of himself. Let the holders of these bonds go into the courts and test their validity. Let them go into the courts and through the courts till they reach the Supreme Court, and then if it is decided that these bonds are valid and just and should be paid, then I for one, if occupying a seat upon this floor, will vote to make them valid. But it is unfair to the people of that Territory, it is unjust to this House, to ask us under a suspension of the rules, with only twenty minutes' debate on each side, to rush through legislation like this when the committee itself has failed to bring forward the figures and facts in detail as they should have been presented. We have nothing here but a meager report, giving not the facts, not the ordinances or laws of the Territory under which these bonds were issued, but simply stating the amendments which it is proposed shall be engrafted upon the bill to be thus put through the House nolens volens under suspension of the rules.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. WASHINGTON. This side has but twenty minutes. Let the gentleman consume, if he chooses, some of the time allotted to the other side in defending this measure, which, in my judgment, can not be successfully defended here or elsewhere.

Mr. PERKINS. Because you are not informed.

Mr. WASHINGTON. The gentleman says I am not informed. Sir, the committee has never sought in a proper way to inform the House in regard to this measure. I served on the Committee on Territories for a long time with my distinguished friend, and in those days we never brought forward reports like this, covering up the facts rather than giving information. Let the House have light, and with proper light upon the facts we are willing to vote upon the question. I return the rest of my time to the gentleman who yielded it to me.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. One minute.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, some time since I received a telegram from the governor of New Mexico, protesting against the passage of this bill. Since that time he has visited the capital, but I was absent and had no opportunity to consult with him in regard to this bill. I understand, however, that he proposes to furnish some additional information bearing on the question, and it does seem to me, in view of this fact, that the suggestion of the representative from the Territory of New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] should be followed, and the further consideration of this bill postponed until that information is furnished, so that we may act intelligently on this question. This is all I care to say.

Mr. LOW. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on the Territories, I desire to make a few observations from a business man's standpoint. I never was a student of Coke or Blackstone, but I have been a student all my life in the buying, selling, receiving, and giving of obligations. If I put my name to a piece of paper obligating myself to pay back a sum of borrowed money, I am in honor bound to liquidate that obligation. Now, what are the facts about this case? Prior to 1880 the people of New Mexico were living in small cities and towns scattered through the Territory. They had not the means of communication between their little inland cities or towns; the business men of the Territory met together and discussed the best methods to be employed to improve and develop the country, and to invite immigration. They decided that it was advisable, if possible, to secure the building of a railroad, so they conferred with the officials of the Atchison and Topeka Railroad Company, who informed them that if they would issue bonds under the authority of the legislature, the company would take the bonds and build the railroad.

That proposition was finally carried out. Upon the application of leading citizens the legislature gave the county authority to issue bonds for the specific purpose of building this railroad through that county. The railroad company accepted the bonds and built the road, which is running through that country to-day. That railroad has developed the country, it has attracted immigrants, and the people there are enjoying all the prosperity thus resulting, but the railroad company could not pay its employees or its obligations with bonds, hence the officials of the company went to New York City in order to float the bonds, and called on Coler & Co., one of the largest bond-brokerage establishments in the country. When those bonds were offered to them by the railroad officials the brokers looked the question over and said they would investigate it. They called in the best legal talent in the city, who examined the enactments and everything bearing upon the question and finally said to the members of the firm: "Those bonds are legally issued." Not satisfied, however, Coler & Co. sent to New Mexico to ascertain how the people felt about the bonds, and in return they received a document signed by a number of business men, members of the board of trade, etc., indorsing the bonds, stating that they would no doubt be paid, and were a good investment.

These bonds at the present time are not in the hands of the railroad company; that company sold them as other bonds are sold, and they are scattered to-day through the country. Up to a certain time the interest on the bonds was paid, and then the coupons were defaulted. Coler & Co. immediately wrote to their clients inviting them to assign to them their bonds and promising to look the matter up. Their agents went to New Mexico and fought the question through the various courts, and they won upon the defaulted coupons. Then by an arrangement the bonds were refunded; the old bonds were given up and new ones issued, bearing, I believe, 5 per cent interest. The people there were satisfied; they paid the interest year after year, until a short time ago, when for some reason there was again a default upon the bonds. That matter has been explained by my distinguished colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OWENS]. The majority of the people in that county want to pay those bonds, but some of the citizens of that Territory, now awaiting admission to Statehood, wish to repudiate a portion of their honest debts.

Mr. Speaker, any man who was guilty of such a thing would be called absolutely dishonest and unworthy of the friendship and confidence of any business community in this country. These bankers do not hold a dollar's worth of the bonds. They are scattered, as I have already said, all over the country, but they are bound to look after the interests of their clients, as they ought to do. The governor of the Territory, together with the best legal talent they have out there, appeared before the committee in opposition to paying the bonds. We heard from them all of their testimony, and my cheek blushed with shame when I realized the fact that a man, after taking part in recommending the issuance of the bonds, should come North afterwards to plead for their repudiation.

Gentlemen, look at it simply from a business point of view; we have had testimony from both sides; it is an honest debt; let them pay it, but not one of the bonds was ever bought at less than 77½ cents on the dollar, and that was when they first came into the market.

Mr. HULICK. What was the governor's objection to paying the bonds?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOW. I do not know. He did not want to pay them. There are a good many other people, you know, who do not want to pay their debts in this world.

Mr. HULICK. But what reason did he give for it?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired; and the question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LACEY) there were—ayes 42, noes 73.

So, two-thirds not voting in favor thereof, the motion was rejected.

CHEESE, OLEOMARGARINE, ETC.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

I am directed by the committee to report back to the House the bills H. R. 3010 and 5680 with a substitute therefor, and recommend the passage of the substitute bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8008) defining cheese, and also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of "filled cheese."

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is what is known as the cheese bill.

I give notice, Mr. Speaker, that on Wednesday morning I will endeavor to have this bill called up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the Chair be kind enough to state what this is? We have been unable to hear a word the gentleman said.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman says that this is the "cheese bill." [Laughter.]

FORT ASSINNIBOINE MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately on the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider Senate bill No. 626 in the House in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The bill referred to in the resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 626) providing for the disposal of lands on abandoned portions of the Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation in Montana, and for the relief of certain settlers thereon.

Be it enacted, etc., That all lands which have been or may hereafter be excluded from the limits of the Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation in the State of Montana shall be open to the operation of the laws regulating homestead entry, except section 2301 of the Revised Statutes, and to entry under the town-site laws and the laws governing the disposal of coal lands, desert lands, and mineral lands, and shall not be subject to sale under the provisions of any act relating to the sale of abandoned military reservations: Provided, That if the entire reservation be abandoned for military purposes this act shall not apply to an area 1 mile square embracing the Government buildings at Fort Assinniboine.

SEC. 2. That all entries heretofore made in good faith under either the homestead, town-site, desert-land, or mineral-land laws of the United States upon any of the excluded portions of said Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation shall be held valid, and the Secretary of the Interior is directed to reinstate such entries under either of said laws as he may heretofore have canceled because of a construction based upon the opinion that the laws mentioned in section 1 of this act did not apply to the abandoned portions of said reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is a second required?

Mr. HULL. I would like to ask a question first. Has this been before any committee of the House?

Mr. HARTMAN. It has been reported unanimously by the Committee on the Public Lands of the House, unanimously by the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, and it has passed the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I demand a second simply to have an explanation.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire a count?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I am willing that a second shall be ordered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I can state briefly the provisions and purposes of this bill, and I do not think I shall ask or will be required to occupy more than five or ten minutes of the time of the House.

The situation is simply this: The boundaries of the Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation in Montana were designated on the 4th of March, 1880, by an Executive order. Subsequently to that—that is, on May 1, 1888—the Indian title to the land in that portion of the reservation which is used for military purposes was extinguished, leaving the military reservation created by Executive order as the only barrier to settlement of the lands under the general law. But subsequently three Executive orders were issued—that is, on May 2, 1888, September 25, 1888, and October 9, 1891—and certain lands were, at the dates named, excluded from the military reservation. On the strength of these orders, especially the order of May 1, 1888, it was presumed that these lands were open to homestead settlement. It was so presumed by the officers of the United States Government themselves, the local land officers and others, and upon that presumption something like two hundred bona fide settlers settled upon the lands with the intention of acquiring title to them under the homestead law.

They have gone upon these lands, as I say, upon the faith of their entries being accepted by the United States Land Office, and there are 138 of them, whose affidavits I hold here in my hand, who depose and say that they will be unable to purchase these lands if they are thrown open to public sale under the provisions of the act providing for the disposal of abandoned military reservations at public auction. These men have families consisting, all told, of 393 people. They have placed $170,965 worth of improvements upon these lands. They have taken up 25,360 acres, all told, and each one of these 138 people makes affidavit that unless he is permitted to complete his title to these lands he will be compelled to forfeit his entry, his improvements, and his three or four years of labor. I will refer to one affidavit, which is a fair specimen of the others. They are substantially duplicates. Mr. Fred A. Scott makes affidavit that he is a native-born citizen, 32 years of age; that he located upon these lands, the northeast quarter of section 26, giving the town and range. He goes on and states the improvements which he has put upon the land, a log house, with fences, log stable, log granary, log cattle shed, and so forth, the total improvements amounting to $1,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill has the unanimous report of the Committee on Public Lands. It was referred to the Secretary of the Interior, and I read to the House an extract from what the Secretary of the Interior says:

The proposed bill, so far as its language is concerned, is identical with the act of May 1, 1888, and its effect, besides validating the entries, excepts the land in question from the operation of the acts of July 5, 1884, and of August 23, 1894. I have no objections to offer to the proposed bill, as it is not in the province of this Department to attempt to interfere with whatever disposition of the public domain the Congress may see fit to make of it.

Mr. Speaker, if this bill be not passed, these settlers, having families consisting of 393 people, all told, having the improvements upon their lands which I have stated, will be compelled to abandon all of the work which they have performed there in the last three or four years. The bill has passed the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, unless some other gentleman desires to address the House upon this question or to interrogate me, I shall move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not move the previous question.

Mr. HARTMAN. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. That motion is already before the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is entitled to twenty minutes, if he desires that time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I simply wish to suggest that the motion is not to suspend the rules and pass the bill. The motion is to suspend the rules and pass a resolution which provides for the consideration of the bill. I have nothing to say against the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

The bill (S. 626) providing for disposal of lands on abandoned portions of the Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in Montana, and for the relief of certain settlers thereon, was read.

Mr. DINGLEY. I should like to ask how many acres are included in this reservation?

Mr. HARTMAN. Originally there were in the reservation 560,800 acres; but under the various acts of Congress 400,160 acres have been turned over to the public domain, leaving 168,640 acres still in the reservation. That statement is contained in a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. DINGLEY. All of that land would be opened up for settlement under the homestead act?

Mr. HARTMAN. Yes, the remaining amount.

Mr. DINGLEY. As the law now stands, the land is to be sold at public auction?

Mr. HARTMAN. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Are they more valuable than ordinary desert or arid lands?

Mr. HARTMAN. Some of the lands are very fertile, but the greater part of them are foothill lands which one can not afford to go upon and purchase and which yet become valuable for grazing purposes.

Mr. STEELE. Is it provided that these lands are to be sold at public auction?

Mr. HARTMAN. My bill provides that all of them shall be open to homestead entry or entry under the public-land laws of the United States.

Mr. STEELE. Without reference to their value?

Mr. HARTMAN. Without reference to their value.

Mr. STEELE. Is the passage of the bill recommended by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. HARTMAN. Not by the Secretary of War, but by the Secretary of the Interior. The lands were turned over to the Secretary of the Interior by Executive proclamation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to ask the gentleman from Montana if this bill has been indorsed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office?

Mr. HARTMAN. I just read from a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior bases his letter upon a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The Secretary of the Interior says:

> I have no objection to offer to the proposed bill, as it is not the province of this Department to attempt to interfere with whatever disposition of the public domain the Congress may see fit to make of it.

And I want to say right here, before I forget it, that the Secretary of the Interior has decided that all of these parties who are now upon these lands are trespassers ab initio, and unless this legislation is passed they will be compelled to purchase these lands which they themselves have made valuable by their own labor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to offer unless some gentleman desires to ask me a question.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, there is another reason why this bill ought to pass. What is known as the McRae Act, for the disposal of military reservations, was drawn with special reference to smaller tracts, tracts that were valuable by reason of being near railroads, having military posts within them, and often towns within them. The Assinniboine tract is a large tract, far remote from settlement; and the reasons that apply to the adoption of the McRae law in regard to putting up these public lands and selling them at public auction do not apply with the same force to this reservation, it being a very large one. The tract is as wild as any Indian reservation that has been taken in for settlement for many years. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HARTMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion, the Chair submits the following report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and bills of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker, to wit:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 159) to authorize the Secretary of War to prepare and submit estimates for the improvement of the harbor at Portland, Me.;

A bill (H. R. 2912) granting to the Atchison and Nebraska Railroad Company and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, its lessee in perpetuity, the right of way over a part of the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian Reservation, in the States of Kansas and Nebraska;

A bill (H. R. 4632) for the relief of Frederick B. Betts, surviving partner of the firm of Betts, Nichols & Co.; and

A bill (H. R. 5736) to authorize the Light-House Board to proceed with the construction of the light-house and fog signal on North Manitou Island, Lake Michigan.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STOKES, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SPENCER, for eight days, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. DOWNING, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEWART of New Jersey, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HENRY of Connecticut, for ten days, on account of business.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

By unanimous consent, on request of Mr. PICKLER, a reprint was ordered of the bill (H. R. 5549) to prevent discontinuance of pensions, to restore pensions discontinued, to establish uniform rates of pension, to facilitate the allowance of pensions in matters of proof, and for other purposes, and report.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to.

And accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers inclosing a reply to the public resolution approved March 24, 1896, relating to a resurvey of the port of Fairport, Ohio—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 7, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior recommending that there be inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill a clause appropriating the sum of $1,000 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to examine the desert lands selected by the States under the provisions of section 4 of the act of August 18, 1894; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RIGHT OF WAY OVER INDIAN LANDS IN KANSAS AND NEBRASKA

Mr. ALLEN. A short time ago the Senate passed a bill (S. 941) granting to the Atchison and Nebraska Railroad Company and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, its lessee in perpetuity, the right of way over a part of the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian Reservation, in the States of Kansas and Nebraska. The bill was sent to the House of Representatives, but a similar bill had been passed there by the time the Senate bill reached the House of Representatives, and the House bill has been passed here. The Senate bill having been returned to the Senate, I ask that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered, and that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLEN presented a petition of Federal Union, No. 6332, American Federation of Labor, of Lincoln, Nebr., praying for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin presented a petition of sundry citizens of Diamond Bluff, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation giving to second-class mail matter, such as religious tracts, full advantage of the act of July 16, 1894; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Waukesha, Wis., remonstrating against the appropriation of money for sectarian purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TELLER. I have a large number of petitions from branches of the American Federation of Labor, requesting the United States Senate to pass a law giving to the people of the United States free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation. The petitioners declare that they are of opinion that to do so would relieve the present monetary stringency and contribute toward bringing to us a return of national prosperity. In the case of the Federal Labor Union of Missoula, Mont., the following is added:

> And further, that we will not vote for or assist in any way any candidate who is doubtful in regard to free coinage, no difference to what political party he may belong, or what our political opinions have been in the past.

I ask that the petitions be properly noted, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The petitions were referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

A petition of Central Labor Union, of Cleveland, Ohio (composed of 52 labor organizations); a petition of American Federation of Labor, of Auburndale, Ohio; a petition of American Agents' Association, of Findlay, Ohio (representing a membership of 12,000); a petition of Lathe Operators' Union No. 6625, of Toledo, Ohio; a petition of Drill-Press and Milling Machine Hands' Union No. 6505, of Toledo, Ohio; a petition of council of Hillsboro County, Fla. (representing 4 labor organizations in Tampa); a petition of Scranton Central Labor Union, of Scranton, Pa. (representing 3,500 workingmen of all branches of trade); a petition of Beef Boners' Union No. 6151, of Kansas City, Kans.; a petition of Federal Labor Union, of Missoula, Mont.; a petition of Germania Waiters' Protection Association, of New York City; a petition of local union, No. 87, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; a petition of Journeymen Tailors' Union, of Bloomington, Ill.; a petition of Waiters' Union No. 21, of Detroit, Mich.; a petition of Herbert Waiters' Union No. 11, of New York City; a petition of Federal Labor Union No. 6360, of New Orleans, La.; a petition of Brockton Central Labor Union, of Brockton, Mass. (representing 4,000 organized workers); a petition of Carriage Hardware Workers' Union No. 6419, of Columbus, Ohio; a petition of Trades and Labor Assembly, of Superior, Wis.; a petition of Trades and Labor Assembly, of Denver, Colo.; and a petition of Federal Labor Union No. 6400, of Everett, Wash.

Mr. TELLER presented sundry memorials of citizens of Colorado, remonstrating against the placing of the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Denver, Colo., praying that an appropriation be made for the transmississippi international exposition to be held at Omaha, Nebr.; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of South Denver, Colo., praying for the enactment of legislation giving to second-class mail matter, such as religious tracts, full advantage of the act of July 16, 1894; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. STEWART presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Genoa, Nev., remonstrating against the placing of the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. SEWELL presented the memorial of Charles A. Milham and 134 other citizens of Washington, N. J., remonstrating against the placing of the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition of the St. Augustine Presbytery of Paterson, N. J., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRICE presented a memorial of Cincinnati Club, No. 1, Order of the Bronze Club, of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the appropriation of money for sectarian institutions; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of Putnam Grange, No. 142, Patrons of Husbandry, of Leipsic, Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 2626, providing for the protection of agricultural staples by an export bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Trades and Labor Assembly of Massillon, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to establish additional regulations concerning immigration to the United States, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce and Merchants' Exchange of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the establishment of a department of commerce and manufactures; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of J. J. Manning, assistant treasurer of the National Malleable Casting Company of Toledo, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation providing a reform in the postal affairs of the country, and also for the restriction of second-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Clinton County, Ohio, remonstrating against the introduction of military training in the public schools of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DANIEL presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Lynchburg, Va., remonstrating against any change being made in the present pilotage system; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of H. D. Moore and sundry other citizens of Onancock, Va., remonstrating against the placing of the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of Encampment No. 83, Union Veteran Legion, of Worcester, Mass., praying for the enactment of a per diem pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of Washington Camp, No. 7, Patriotic Order Sons of America, of Englewood, Ill., remonstrating against the appropriation of money for sectarian purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PROCTOR presented a petition of Ransom Post, No. 7, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Vermont, praying for the enactment of a service-pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRITCHARD presented the petition of W. H. Chadbourn and other members of the Chamber of Commerce of Wilmington, N. C., praying for the establishment of an army post adjacent to that city; which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

Mr. CARTER presented a petition of the White Ribbon Society of Montana, praying for the establishment of an international board of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. THURSTON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Florence, Nebr., remonstrating against the placing of the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition of Perryville Circle, No. 13, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Litchfield, Nebr., praying for the enactment of a service-pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Western Nebraska Educational Association, praying for the enactment of legislation ceding to the State of Nebraska for educational purposes the old Fort Sidney Military Reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of the city council of Salt Lake City, Utah; of the Board of Trade of Laramie, Wyo.; of the Republican convention of Hot Springs, S. Dak.; of the committee on manufactures and commerce of the legislature of Utah; of the Commercial Club of St. Joseph, Mo., and of the Mining Exchange of Colorado, praying that an appropriation be made for the transmissisippi international exposition to be held at Omaha, Nebr.; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Dak., reported it without amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

EDWARD RICE.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1853) for the relief of Edward Rice, to report it favorably without amendment. As it is very short, and the reading of it will take but a moment, I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Edward Rice, of Denver, in the State of Colorado, formerly of Worcester, in the State of Massachusetts, the sum of $2,700, in full for the following coupon bonds issued under the act of March 3, A. D. 1865, known as consols of 1867, namely: Nos. 104568 and 104569, of $100 each; Nos. 61857, 61858, and 61859, of $500 each; and No. 101302, of $1,000, and, in addition thereto, the interest maturing on said bonds after July 1, A. D. 1868, to the date when said bonds ceased to bear interest: Provided, That said Edward Rice shall first give bond, with sureties to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in a sum double the amount of said bonds, conditioned to secure the United States harmless against said bonds and coupons, said bonds having been lost by said Edward Rice on the 19th day of July, A. D. 1868.

Mr. MORRILL. I will merely say that the Secretary of the Treasury reports favorably upon this bill, and that none of the coupons have been presented since 1868, and the bill is in the usual form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHICKAMAUGA AND CHATTANOOGA NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. PALMER. The joint select committee charged with the duty of representing Congress at the dedication of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park have directed me to submit a report to the Senate, and also a resolution which I ask may be read and considered immediately. The resolution is at the conclusion of the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved. That the report of the joint committee to represent Congress at the dedication of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park be printed and recommitted to that committee for the incorporation of a map and of the corrected manuscript of the several addresses delivered in connection with the dedication.

Mr. PALMER. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

THE DEATH PENALTY.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted, to report it with amendments. I ask the Senate to make the bill a special order for Wednesday of next week, after the special orders which are now on the Calendar. There are two special orders before it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ALLEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I ask whether making the bill a special order would give it precedence over the Alabama election resolution, which has been reported favorably?

Mr. HOAR. I understand that it does not displace anything. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the condition of our law in regard to the death penalty in cases of crimes committed within the jurisdiction of the United States is utterly savage, and it ought not to last in regard to some cases a week without interposition. There is now one judge who, I think, has sentenced within the last few years 150 persons and over to death, and there are some 30 or 40 persons awaiting trial before him now. Some of the crimes are crimes which ought not to be punished except by a very brief imprisonment.

The bill has passed the other House and it has passed the Senate Judiciary Committee unanimously. But there are provisions in it to which the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], who has given the subject great study, wishes to call attention in order that the bill may be modified in some particulars. I suppose the debate will not last more than an hour or so, but it ought not to get into the general drift of business on the Calendar, and I want to have it made a special order after the existing special orders. I understand that it will not displace either an appropriation bill or another special order or the Alabama matter.

Mr. ALLEN. I am entirely in accord with the Senator's bill. If I had it within my power, I would abolish capital punishment; I do not believe in it; but the only thing I want to know is whether making the bill a special order will interfere with the Alabama resolution.

Mr. HOAR. No; I understand it will not.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I have no objection to the Senator's request.

Mr. HOAR. I will see that it does not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, and the bill is made a special order for the day named.

Mr. HOAR subsequently said: I made a request early this morning, which was granted, I believe unanimously, by the Senate, making the capital-punishment bill a special order for Wednesday of next week. I omitted to mention the hour in the request. I desire that it may be made the special order for Wednesday at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. STEWART. We do not know in this part of the Chamber what the request is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is that the capital-punishment bill, which has been made a special order for Wednesday of next week, shall be fixed for consideration at 2 o'clock. Is there objection? There is no objection, and it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 2745) to establish a term of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Roanoke, Va., in the western district of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2746) to remove the political disabilities of Col. John Taylor Wood; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2747) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Levi Cunningham; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PUGH introduced a bill (S. 2748) providing that all judgments in civil causes in the District of Columbia shall bear interest; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 2749) to establish the official survey of fractional townships 31 and 32 north, of ranges 6, 7, and 8 west, of the sixth principal meridian, in the State of Nebraska, north and west of the Niobrara River, and quieting the title of settlers thereon, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 2750) to provide an American register for the bark Leon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2751) granting two condemned cannon for the soldiers' plat of the cemetery at Mount Pulaski, Ill.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRICE introduced a bill (S. 2752) granting a pension to Wilson S. Hulse; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 2753) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate one condemned cannon to the Lake Madison Veteran Association, Grand Army of the Republic, of the State of South Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2754) granting a pension to Jerusha Hayward Brown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TURPIE (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 2755) granting an increase of pension to Edwin T. Lucado; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 2756) granting a pension to Richard Sheets; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 2757) granting a pension to Sarah M. Dove; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THURSTON introduced a bill (S. 2758) granting a pension to Hiram H. Palmer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

LIMITATION OF THE VETO POWER.

Mr. BUTLER. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read at length for information.

The joint resolution (S. R. 122) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for limiting the veto power of the President of the United States was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, etc., That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall become and be a part of the Constitution, and shall be known as the sixteenth amendment:

That every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States. If he approves, he shall sign it; but if not he shall return it with his objections to the House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, a majority of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by a majority of that House it shall become a law.

Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the House of Representatives and Senate may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him; or being disapproved by him, may be repassed by a majority of the Senate and House of Representatives according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I should like to be permitted to explain the joint resolution in a few words.

This amendment keeps the wording of the Constitution and the machinery with reference to the veto power just as it is now. It will be noticed that the only change it makes in the Constitution is by changing the words "two-thirds" to "a majority." The amendment, if adopted, will require a bill when passed to be sent to the President for his signature. If the President disapproves it, he writes his objections and sends it back to the House where it originated, just as he does now. The House will consider his objections and proceed to reconsider the bill. The only difference is, if both Houses see fit to repass the bill after considering the President's objections thereto, then it shall become a law by a majority vote instead of by a two-thirds vote.

Nearly every evil that this Government is suffering from to-day has come about not from defects in the Constitution, Mr. President, but, if I may say it, by a disregard or deliberate misinterpretation or an interpreting away of the Constitution as it was written and intended by our forefathers. Take the decision of the Supreme Court with reference to the income-tax cases and hundreds of other cases which might be cited, where we know, or feel that we know, that the intent of the Constitution has been changed. The evils come not from a defective Constitution as a rule, but from a disregard of the Constitution.

But this veto power is one provision where the Constitution, we might say, is defective. It is one relic of monarchy. When our forefathers framed this Constitution they lacked just this much of being weaned from English ideas. They could not foresee the tremendous patronage that would go into the hands of the President in addition to this veto power. They could not foresee and did not intend that the veto power should be used to kill any bill that the President did not himself like. In fact, the veto power was intended to be used sparingly, and very sparingly; and we have the testimony of a number of the framers of the Constitution to that effect. It is an English idea, but in England the Crown to-day does not dare to veto a bill passed by Parliament. It has fallen into disuse in a kingdom, in a monarchy, but here in this country it flourishes and is used more frequently each year. The people here elect their representatives for both Houses of Congress directed to enact the will of the people into law; yet one man—not even a legislator—has the monstrous authority and power to nullify any act of Congress. A bill is passed after the most careful and deliberate consideration by the representatives of the people; yet it can be vetoed and nullified by a stroke of a pen in the hand of one man.

This is a dangerous power. When we consider to-day the tremendous patronage that the President has with which he can influence legislation, in addition to the veto power to kill what is passed, it makes him almost an autocrat. It gives him more power than any crowned head of England or, we might say, than any monarch in Europe has. We saw here in the last Congress how the power and the patronage of the President were used to change the opinions of Congress and to defeat the will of the people. We saw in the same Congress how the veto power was used to strike down a bill that was passed by Congress to coin the seigniorage.

Nearly every Administration since the civil war has used the veto power and the patronage of the Government the same way. The abuse and danger grows greater each year.

These two powers are too great to be in the hands of any one man. We ought if possible to limit his power of patronage. It ought to be limited, but that is an intricate question. We can limit his veto power by this wise provision.

I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I hope that the committee will make a favorable report at an early day, so that we can act upon it before the present session of Congress ends.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BERRY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHOUP submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CARTER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the fortifications appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ISLAND OF JAPONSKY.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas the guardian of Michael Travers, a citizen of the United States, who has been declared a person non compos mentis, has represented to the Senate of the United States by a sworn petition that he has been unjustly deprived by the United States of certain property known as the Island of Japonsky, in the harbor of Sitka, Alaska, and the improvements thereon: Therefore

Be it resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to ascertain and report to the Senate the facts concerning the location and residence of the said Michael Travers upon the Island of Japonsky, the making improvements thereon by him, their character and extent, the taking of the possession of such island and improvements by the officers of the United States, and the value thereof for the uses to which the island and property were put by the United States, which information the said Attorney-General may obtain from the governor of Alaska and the district attorney of the United States and the clerk of the United States court of Alaska, and from other sources at his command.

CHARLES E. JONES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 249) granting a pension to Charles E. Jones, which was, in line 7, to strike out all after the word "at" and insert in lieu thereof "the rate proportionate to the degree of disability from gunshot wound of the back and results."

Mr. BAKER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 6th instant approved and signed the following act and joint resolutions:

An act (S. 494) constituting Stamford, Conn., a subport of entry;

A joint resolution (S. R. 99) authorizing the immediate use of a portion of the unexpended balance of appropriations made for construction of canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River in construction of protecting walls necessary to the opening of said canal and locks to navigation; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 103) directing the Secretary of War to submit estimates of cost of further improvement of Providence River and Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. ALLISON. By unanimous consent last evening it was agreed that the Post-Office appropriation bill should be taken up this morning at the conclusion of the routine business. I ask that that bill be laid before the Senate.

Mr. PUGH. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration House bill 6996, a brief bill reported by the Committee on Commerce this morning.

Mr. ALLISON. Under the agreement of yesterday I am obliged to object to any business being interposed.

Mr. PUGH. It will take but a few moments. It is very important that the bill should be passed at an early date.

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps the Senator from Alabama was not present yesterday when it was agreed by unanimous consent that after the routine morning business this morning the appropriation bill then under consideration should be taken up. The Senator will probably have time to-morrow morning to call up the bridge bill.

Mr. PUGH. Then I will withhold my request until another time.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Iowa, inasmuch as I gave notice yesterday that I would request the Senate to proceed this morning to the consideration of the joint resolution I introduced relative to Cuba, to allow it to be taken up for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] to submit some remarks. I suppose it will not materially interfere with the progress of the appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ALLISON. Last evening there was unanimous consent given to consider the appropriation bill from now until 5 o'clock, when a vote was agreed to be taken. I regard that as an agreement to go on with the bill at this time. Of course it is for the Senate to determine whether that agreement shall be changed.

Mr. CALL. I do not wish to interfere with any agreement that may have been made, but I supposed that it would not be an interference with the appropriation bill. However, unless my proposition is agreed to unanimously, I do not suppose I ought to insist upon it. I gave notice yesterday that the Senator from Indiana would submit some observations upon the joint resolution this morning, and I simply ask the consent of the Senate that we may take up the joint resolution for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FAULKNER. I would not object to it under the circumstances suggested by the Senator from Florida except for the fact that the unanimous-consent agreement was made yesterday based upon the theory that a certain number of hours should be given to-day to the discussion of the appropriation bill. When the Senator from Iowa proposed 3 o'clock there was objection to it because the time seemed too short between the close of the routine business and 3 o'clock. When he suggested 4 o'clock there was objection to it because the Senate held that that hour would cut off debate unduly upon the bill; and an agreement was only reached when he extended the time for discussion upon the bill until 5 o'clock. Under those circumstances, I think it would be unfair, the Senator from Iowa having obtained unanimous consent upon that statement, to allow any business to intervene other than that which was agreed to at the time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed to the request of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FAULKNER. The notice of the Senator from Florida will hold good for to-morrow. Of course no one will object to the Senator from Indiana taking the floor then, as there will be no consent agreement that will interfere.

Mr. CALL. Then I ask that it may be distinctly understood that the joint resolution shall be taken up to-morrow after the routine business is over.

Mr. ALLEN. For the purpose of discussion only?

Mr. VILAS. For the purpose of discussion by the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CALL. Yes; for the purpose of general discussion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida desire the request submitted to the Senate?

Mr. CALL. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from Florida desires to have the joint resolution taken up for such speeches as anyone may choose to make on it, there is no objection, but if it is to be taken up for consideration, I object now.

Mr. CALL. I ask that it may be taken up for the purpose of some observations to be submitted by the Senator from Indiana, and possibly by myself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. VILAS and others. No objection.

Mr. BROWN. Is it requested that the unfinished business which has been awaiting consideration for some time shall be displaced? If so, I object. Senate joint resolution No. 102 is the unfinished business, and we desire to have it disposed of.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand it to be the request of the Senator from Florida to displace the regular order of business.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not displace anything, for it applies to the morning hour.

Mr. CALL. That is all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. Now let the appropriation bill be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. PASCO to the amendment of Mr. WOLCOTT.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I do not intend to occupy much time this morning. There are only a few observations that I wish to make. There are other subjects to be considered with this bill, and it would be unjustifiable for me to take much time in this discussion. This amendment is a very simple proposition in itself. It is a mere provision that those postmasters who would be payable under the appropriation for postmasters as the bill passed the other House may be paid out of the appropriation for clerks if the offices which they hold should be discontinued and the service then incorporated with some other office.

When the discussion took place the other day I stated that this was no enlargement of the power of the Postmaster-General. He has power, and always has had, to establish and to discontinue post-offices, to establish the methods of the administration of post-offices. But the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] professed great astonishment at that statement in respect to the power of the Postmaster-General and the fact that the law commits to him a very plenary authority over the postal service, and asked some questions which were highly extravagant, as if the Postmaster-General might establish a suboffice 400 miles away from the post-office at Omaha, or 50 miles away, and finally he worked himself up to some statement yesterday, I believe, of a thousand miles, as if the question depended on the distance, or as if an extravagant statement of the abuse of power made a difference from what a reasonable statement would indicate to exist. I answered that there was nothing in the law to prevent. There is not, except what was indicated at the time, that the law was made to be used reasonably, not to be abused in a manner which would perhaps subject an officer to impeachment.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] took exception to the observation that the power to establish and discontinue post-offices has existed since the original institution of the general post-office in this country, and drew particular attention to the fact that, in the conclusion of the debate, the language used seemed to be that the power to establish stations had also existed. That has in truth existed as a matter of power, and I want to point it out. Although the first enactment was in the year 1862, by which the Postmaster-General was given in explicit terms authority to establish branch post-offices, he always has had it. It was but a new expression of a power which existed from the beginning of the Government.

I call attention to the first law on that subject which was passed by the Continental Congress in the year 1775. It probably is within the remembrance of the historical reading of Senators that when the general post-office was established in this country, it was committed almost without legislation to Benjamin Franklin to operate.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to correct him now?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator denies having stated that the Postmaster-General could establish substations a thousand miles from the main office. I call attention to his language used in the debate of last Thursday.

Mr. VILAS. On what page?

Mr. ALLEN. On page 3485 of the RECORD, second column.

> Mr. ALLEN. The question is, has he the power to send a man from a point 300 or 400 miles distant from where those people live to administer the affairs of their office?
> Mr. VILAS. I suppose he has power now to send one a thousand miles.

Mr. VILAS. That is an entirely different thing from the other statement in regard to stations.

Mr. ALLEN. No.

Mr. VILAS. That I reaffirm, if it is necessary.

Mr. ALLEN. What I charge the Senator with saying, which he now denies, as I understand, is——

Mr. VILAS. I do not deny.

Mr. ALLEN. That the Postmaster-General has the power to establish a subpost-office a thousand or more miles from the main post-office, and send a clerk from the main office to that subpost-office to administer its affairs; and I was correct in that.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Nebraska was, as usual, incorrect, and can not see that he was. He is confounding two entirely independent statements. The statement in respect to the establishment of a substation was one thing. The other was with respect to the power of the Postmaster-General to appoint a postmaster; and it was said that the only limitation in the law is that the postmaster must reside within the district, but it does not say the appointment must be made of a person who was previously a resident of the district. So a postmaster might come from a considerable distance.

Mr. President, I am not denying the affirmations made that day. I am simply explaining that as a matter of power, which is all we were talking about, the law is so. Let me now recur for a moment—because there is the point of interest—to the original act, which was passed on the 26th of July, 1775. All that it said on this subject was:

> That a postmaster-general be appointed for the united colonies, who shall hold his office at Philadelphia, and shall be allowed a salary of $1,000 per annum for himself and $340 per annum for a secretary and comptroller, with power to appoint such and so many deputies as to him may seem proper and necessary.

A little later, the next year, postmasters were excused from military duties by an additional law; authority was given the Postmaster-General to appoint two additional surveyors of the Post-Office and an inspector of dead letters; and it will be curious nowadays to note, en passant, that he was directed to preserve carefully, among other things, all "lottery tickets, notes of hand, and other valuable papers," etc.

Subsequently, in 1782, there was an ordinance passed, as it was called, "for regulating the Post-Office of the United States of America." Then authority was given to the Postmaster-General in these words:

> He shall have full power and authority to appoint a clerk or assistant to himself, and such and so many deputy postmasters as he shall think proper, for whose fidelity he shall be accountable; each of whom shall reside at such place as the Postmaster-General shall judge best suited to maintain a due and regular transportation and exchange of mails.

When the Constitution had gone into effect Congress passed a simple act on the 22d of September, 1789, declaring—

> That there shall be appointed a Postmaster-General; his powers and salary, and the compensation to the assistant or clerk and deputies which he may appoint, and the regulations of the Post-Office shall be the same as they last were under the resolutions and ordinances of the late Congress.

At a later time an act was passed, in 1792, in which it was provided that there should be established at the seat of Government of the United States a general post-office; that there should be one

Postmaster-General, who should have authority to appoint an assistant and deputy postmaster at all places as such should be found necessary.

That was repeated in 1794, and authority was given the Postmaster-General to make regulations to govern such deputies as he chose to appoint.

Without stopping to elaborate or point out the gradual extension in our law of that idea, it has been continued from that time to this, simply a grant of authority to the Postmaster-General to maintain a general post-office—that was the original act—and to appoint such deputies in that general post-office as he saw fit and have them reside anywhere in the United States he saw fit to direct. Gradually there have been slight qualifications of that power; but in substance the power has remained ever since. He could make a deputy and tell him to do what he wanted done. So when the law came into effect which authorized the establishment of branch offices by terms, it added nothing whatever to the authority which had previously existed and merely recognized a practice which, I suppose, had some time before been in operation under the Postmaster-General's power to make a post-office and to appoint a deputy postmaster, or to establish what was afterwards called a post-office, and appoint a postmaster thereat, and fix the duties; to establish a branch office, a power originally involved in the power to establish a post-office, as the greater includes the less.

The Senator from Florida said yesterday that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado were to be adopted he was satisfied that the word "station" or "substation" would appear in the legislation of the country for the first time in connection with the Post-Office Department. Mr. President, if that were true it would not alter the question, because it would be merely the application of a name which has grown up in the postal service for one of the offices of the Department which was permissible under the old law, and which the act of 1862 called a branch post-office. The more convenient name "station" has been adopted. But the Senator from Florida is quite mistaken in respect to the literal fact. In the law of 1889, the act of March 2, there is provision made for superintendents of stations, ten classes, graded from $1,000 up to $2,000.

Mr. ALLISON. From what does the Senator read?

Mr. VILAS. From page 200 of the Postal Laws and Regulations. Then there is provision for clerks in charge of stations, nine classes. That is a mere recognition of the name which has been given to certain convenient agencies for the discharge of the postal service that had been created by the Postmaster-General in the exercise of the power which, as I said, had existed since Benjamin Franklin was made the first Postmaster-General and invested in propria persona with all the functions of the postal service, pretty much all being left to his discretion.

Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska—I am sorry he is absent—made the discovery that this blessed system, upon which he expatiated somewhat, in which the people are so much interested, and which is of such great comfort to them, which is their system above all others, is, after all, thus but a mere despotism, and everything that has been done under the power of the United States has been the exercise of a despotic authority against which his very nature rebels. I suppose he may open out to his Populistic audiences upon that subject in a way that may excite terror in their minds; but, after all, we have been having what he has recognized all the time, the very best postal service, and by reason of this very power being vested in the Postmaster-General. It is one of those services which it will be impossible to control or operate if there is to be established by law various grades down through the 150,000 people, more or less, who are at work in it, points of resistance, points where authority may be set up against the Postmaster-General. He must have a complete, plenary, and despotic, if you please, authority over that service. He is obliged to collect a revenue of $70,000,000 a year, 2 cents at a time mostly, and it requires the full vigor and strength of authority in every branch of that service to conduct it well.

For that reason, if this amendment be not adopted, I hope there will be no such thing as interference in this bill with the authority which has existed so long and with so much advantage to the country. If we do not choose to permit the Postmaster-General to have money to expend for clerks according to his desire, at least let us not interpose upon an appropriation bill some of these amendments which would be detriments and obstructions to the good service of that Department; such an amendment as that proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, such an one as proposed by the Senator from Florida, that the Postmaster-General shall not make a substation except within the corporate limits of a city or town. Have we heard any complaint from the State of Massachusetts because he has made the post-office at Boston extend the benefits and convenience of that service over a tract of country with a radius sufficient to comprehend the outlying towns? On the contrary, from every quarter the service so established has been praised as an improvement and a benefit. That is all that is sought by the Postmaster-General in this very measure which he recommends.

Let me call attention to the points in which he has summed up in a note to the chairman of the Post-Office Committee of the House of Representatives what he considers the advantages of this amendment, which he asks merely to enable him to exercise easily a power he now possesses. He is not seeking a new power; not seeking to do a new thing; he is seeking to make no radical change; but only, as he says, discreetly and with prudence and with moderate expense, to exert a power which has always been possessed by that Department in some few and proper instances wherein benefit to the service will result from it. Thus he says:

> Summing up the advantages of such consolidation of offices, I would say that it—
> First. Strengthens and improves the postal organization by introducing through a natural and easy development of the existing system competent local supervision, responsibility, and control;
> Second. Lessens by a large amount the necessary expenditure for the postal service, with the certainty that this decrease will gradually swell into millions of dollars annually;
> Third. Improves and increases the postal facilities of the people, which, in turn,
> Fourth. Improves and increases the revenue of the Post-Office Department.
> Fifth. Insures a prompter and more intelligent accounting for public funds with less bookkeeping, less correspondence, fewer requisitions for supplies, and less call for inspection from the Department.
> Sixth. Calls for no legislation, and no increase of postal officers.
> Seventh. Increases gradually the number of offices and officials under civil service, and thus, among many advantages, insures a better and more businesslike management.

Mr. President, this is so plain a proposition that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, when it was first proposed by the Senator from Colorado, expressed his willingness to accept it as an amendment to the bill without discussion, and probably it would have been so accepted, but the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] uncorked the bottle and let out the genii of opposition to civil-service reform. Thereupon it seems to be understood a change of system in the civil service has arisen, some proposed extension of the classified service to a great extent, and it seems that that alarm is to stand in the way of an improved service. It would have been promptly accepted but for that. It may be that there is something in civil-service reform which challenges the instant uprising of this body and is sufficient to defeat any measure if a prejudice like this can be excited. But I shall not debate civil-service reform. I am only speaking of this question as an improvement to the civil service. I do believe that among the greatest forward steps which have been made for a good many years in the civil service has been the gradual step of extension of civil-service reform. Not that I like them all—its features as practiced—not that I would not improve and change them very much, if I could have my way with respect to it—at least I think it would improve them—but what has been done is a step in the right direction, and I trust it will not be retraced except as it may be reviewed for the purpose of a better and more advantageous step forward.

I shall not debate the civil-service question at all. I have never been a debater on that subject. It has been much exploited by some persons who have not caused so much benefit as perhaps would have been caused by the advocacy of others, while it has also had the help of the best.

Civil-service advancement in this country owes its success to the man who is now at the head of this Government. Without his firm, steady, unflinching, and honest devotion to it there would have been, in my judgment, for a long period of time no very great and substantial, no enduring gain or advancement in the cause of civil-service reform.

Mr. President, I do not care to take any more time.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator a question before he sits down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. VILAS. I have already yielded the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. We have had repeated assertions upon this floor as to what civil-service reform has accomplished, but there has not been a Senator who has debated that question who has pointed out one particular wherein the present service excels the service as it existed twenty-five years ago.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I think that the Senator himself indicated pretty plainly to most of us in what was said yesterday one feature of very great gain. He said that there had been abuses—I am not stopping to discuss the subject—in the reduction of Republican clerks during this Administration. Under the old system, if it had been in existence, we should have seen in 1885, in 1889, and again in 1893 such a swarm of applicants for these thousands and thousands of offices here in Washington as would have completely, or almost completely, obstructed the performance of the public business. We saw enough of it to retard the performance of that business for months; and it would come with the recurrence of every change in the political administration. Senators would have been obliged to listen, as they are now in greater or less degree, to the entreaties and supplications of those who were torn from office by the ruthless hand of partisanship or those who were seeking to drive out somebody else in order that they might get in for a short time.

If nothing else had been gained by civil-service reform but the decency and cleanliness of political conduct on a change of Administration, it would be enough to constitute a great triumph. This is, however, but a single feature of what has been gained, not all or all that might be. Not everything can be made perfect in this world, and least of all those things which are connected with politics. The relief which has been enjoyed by Senators and Representatives, not to speak of those intrusted with the offices of the Government, is in itself a second item of great consequence. I shall not stop to add more, because I am, as I said, not inclined now to enter into or to take the time of the Senate in a debate upon the general principles or value of civil-service reform. These are established in this country. Whatever anybody may say in respect to them, there is no one who will now propose in Congress with any reasonable expectation of success the repeal of this beneficent system, so excellent not in what it has yet accomplished alone, but in its promise of what may be effected in the end.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I have listened very carefully to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] with the full confidence and hope that he would say something or point out something that had been accomplished under so-called civil-service reform which did not exist before its introduction; and yet the Senator, like those who preceded him on this subject, has delivered a Fourth of July oration, if I may classify it as such, on the beauties, if not the holiness, of civil-service reform, without ever undertaking to point out an instance in which it had bettered the service. I did not ask the Senator to tell in general language of the beauties of this system of which he is such a strong advocate, but I wanted him to point out the cold facts as they exist, wherein it differs materially from the system that existed before its introduction, and to give the particulars, without any comment, in which it is an improvement over the system that formerly existed, but he has failed to do so, and, in my judgment, can not do so.

I do not propose, Mr. President, to consume the time of the Senate this morning at any considerable length in the discussion of this matter. I discussed it yesterday quite as fully as I desire to do, and I realize that others wish to be heard upon the bill before the vote is taken; but there are a few things which I believe ought to be said at this time and which I will say.

In the first place, there never was a tyrant upon the face of the earth of whom we have any knowledge or any history who did not believe himself superior to all other persons in the government of which he was a member. The very first argument of a tyrant is the one-man power. The next argument of a tryant is unchecked and unguarded discretion in the man who is called upon to discharge a duty. The third step of tyranny is to centralize power in the hands of a few, if not one, and deprive the masses of the people of the right to exercise power. What would become of this Government, speaking of it as a Republic, a government in which the people are supreme, if the principle announced here by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Massachusetts were to prevail? Ninety per cent of the people of this country would be practically disfranchised. The practical power and management of their Government would be taken from them and would be placed in the hands of those who have the hardihood to assert that they and their class are superior in point of education and superior in the qualities which are essential properly to rule, while the masses are inferior in those respects.

I am not myself averse to a sensible and reasonable civil service. I wish to see established a service which will permit every citizen of the country to participate in the affairs of his Government. I believe the only safety to this Government is in diffusing the political power, the official power of the Government, and in keeping it among the masses of the people rather than to centralize it in the hands of a few. Here we are to make (and the Senator from Wisconsin thinks it is something of which I ought to be ashamed, that I did not know it before) the Post-Office Department supreme and tyrannical and dictatorial in this country, and the people themselves have nothing to say as respects their post-offices in the various localities where the offices are situated. The Senator said it has existed since the formation of the Government. If that is true then the time has come when it should be changed. If I had it in power I would say that no post-office which has been established should be altered or changed except by the consent of Congress, the direct representatives of the people. The very element of legislation is either to grant power where it does not otherwise exist or to curtail power where it is supposed to be possessed in excess of the requirements of the occasion or the requirements of the proper administration of a particular office. That is the purpose of legislation.

The Senator from Wisconsin would change all that. The Senator holds up his hands here and says that the system which has been inaugurated by the present occupant of the White House is one that can not be impeached or questioned among intellectual gentlemen. Of course it may be questioned by groundlings and those who are not intellectual. But the system which I want and which I insist upon is one which shall recognize every citizen of this country; that shall keep the power of this Government, national and State, in the hands of the people, and that can be practically and efficiently administered in the interest of the masses.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, the Civil Service Commission is a close corporation. There is another evidence, too, of the unfitness of this system. A Senator or a Representative in Congress can scarcely obtain the truth from one of the Departments, unless it sees fit to give it to him. It is a struggle here half the time to get the truth from one of the Departments about anything. Even a Representative of the people is to be misled and put off with evasive answers as to information which vitally effects the interests of the people, and as to statistical information which is to be found in the Departments. So we can not get the questions which are being put to applicants under the civil-service law at this time, but we can get a few of those which have been used in the past.

Take the State of Tennessee, Mr. President [Mr. HARRIS in the chair], which you ably in part represent and have so represented in this Chamber for almost a quarter of a century. Take a cross-roads post-office at a town where there is nothing but a little store and a blacksmith shop and where the office is worth eighty or a hundred dollars a year, and how much benefit do you suppose it would be to the people of that vicinity to require the occupant of the local office to answer correctly these questions prescribed by the Civil Service Commission?

It does not say whether it is apples or dollars or what it is—

742,155.74
429.39
6,873.68
1,956,374.20

If the old man who has been delivering the mail regularly and to the entire satisfaction of the people of that vicinity for a quarter of a century failed in adding this sum correctly he would be disqualified to hold the office, and some boy who had left school three months before would be eligible.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator from Nebraska will look at the regulations, he will find that no resident of the United States over 45 years can take the examination. All persons beyond 45 years of age are excluded.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to call attention to that fact.

Mr. BATE. And all persons over 35 years of age are excluded from the Railway Mail Service.

Mr. ALLEN. Why not make it 25 years of age?

Question 2. Express in figures one thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine.

Question 3. In the fiscal year ended June 30, 1888, the postal clerks employed on railroads traveled 122,031,194 miles and those employed on steamboats 1,767,649 miles. How many miles more were traveled by railroad than by steamboat?

If the old man could not answer that question, although he is perfectly competent to address envelopes and wrappers and keep a small account of the service of the office, and although he might be able to figure up a sum of three or four hundred dollars, if he could not make the subtraction accurately he would be ineligible to hold the office.

Give work in full.

Question 4. If a railway-mail clerk earns $800 in a year, how much will he have left after paying his board at the rate of $16 a month?

There are a great many fourth-class postmasters in the United States who know absolutely nothing about the Railway Mail Service. It is not essential to them, and it would be of no value to them if they did know it. They would simply be loaded down with a lot of useless and worthless mental baggage. Yet he must be required to answer these questions.

Question 5. If a railway-mail clerk spends 10 cents a day for street-car fare, how much will he spend in six months of 30 days each.

That is a very important question. Suppose it had said if a railway clerk spends 25 cents a day for cigarettes, how much would he have left at the end of the month? I suppose, as a matter of fact, there is not much left now of the salary of an ordinary railway-mail clerk. The work, according to this book, must be given in full.

SIXTH SUBJECT—GEOGRAPHY.

Question 1. Name two States crossed or in part bounded by each of the following-named rivers, and give the capital of each of the States named: Connecticut, Delaware, Ohio, Mississippi, Missouri.

What earthly bearing have such questions upon the fitness of a man who is running a little fourth-class post-office in the country 15 or 20 miles from any large town? Yet, because they are not able to answer those questions, a certain percentage of them—I will not now undertake to say how many, but I think ninety-odd per cent—are to be disqualified from holding those offices, and some man or boy who has made a special study of matters like these, who is fresh from school where it has been instilled in him for years, is eligible to take their places, and the people of the vicinity are to have nothing to say about the administration of the office.

Question 2. Name the State in which you live and the States or foreign countries or bodies of water which form the boundaries on two sides of that State.

Question 3. Name two important cities on each of the following-named rivers and lakes, and give the name of the State in which each of these cities is situated: Hudson River, Ohio River, Mississippi River, Lake Erie, Lake Michigan.

Question 4. Name three cities on or near the Atlantic Ocean, one on or near the Gulf of Mexico, and one on or near the Pacific Ocean.

Question 6. Name the State of the Union that extends farthest east and the State that extends farthest west, and name the capital of each.

Then comes the subject of railways and other systems of transportation in the United States:

Question 1. Name the three principal cities of your State and the principal railway lines (three, if there be that many) centering in each of them.

Question 2. Name the principal railways (not less than two) passing through or terminating in your State, and give five of the principal connections (roads which are crossed by them or terminate in the same city with them) made by either or both of them.

Question 3. Name the roads which together form the most direct line from your nearest railway station (give name of that station) to the largest city in any adjoining State. (Give name of the city and of the adjoining State.)

Question 4. Name the road or roads connecting two of the most important cities in your State, and name ten of the largest cities (or important towns, if there be not ten cities) situated on those roads.

Question 5. Name the two most important railroad centers in each of the States of your railway mail division (omitting your own State) and the road or roads or steamboat lines connecting each of those centers with the capital of your State.

There are other questions of a similar character which applicants are required to answer. It may be said that the questions which I have quoted do not apply and would not be applied to an applicant for a position in a fourth-class post-office. We do not know what questions would be put by the Civil Service Commissioners to applicants for those offices. But we do know that under the statutes and under the rules prescribed by the Chief Executive and adopted by the Civil Service Commissioners they have absolute power to prescribe the questions which shall be answered by the applicants, and a failure to answer them renders those persons ineligible to those offices, which many of them have administered for almost a quarter of a century.

All this vast body of citizens who have borne the heat and burden of the day in their communities and in their States, who have given of their means to support this Government, thousands of whom have rendered service to the Government in its hour of danger—all of those men are to be set aside and ignored and practically disfranchised by the adoption of these silly, nonsensical rules. By that means the people are to be isolated from their own post-offices, from sympathy with the postmaster, who is now a member of their own community, and a stranger with no sympathy for them and not amenable to them under any circumstances or any conditions is to be sent among them to administer the affairs of an office which is purely local, and which is, in fact, their own.

My attention is also called to the fact that no person beyond 35 years of age—I have not examined the regulations and the rules, but I take it to be true—is eligible to the Railway Mail Service. The applicant may have every merit and every qualification to commend him; he may have come from a long line of illustrious ancestors who rendered the country service in its various stages of development; he may be perfect physically and perfect intellectually, and yet, because he has passed the line of 35 years of age, he is absolutely disqualified by that fact from entering this particular branch of the service of his country.

I am also reminded of the fact that when a person reaches 45 years of age he is ineligible to any branch of the service. I do not know whether that be true or not. The Senator from Wisconsin can correct me if it is not true, and if he does not correct me I will assume that it is true.

Mr. VILAS. I did not observe the previous statement of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. I said that no person can enter the Railway Mail Service who is over 35 years of age.

Mr. VILAS. I believe that is the age.

Mr. ALLEN. Regardless of his qualifications.

Mr. VILAS. Does the Senator from Nebraska object to that rule?

Mr. ALLEN. I do most strenuously object to it.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks those offices are created for the benefit of the officeholders or for the benefit of the people of the United States?

Mr. ALLEN. They are created for the benefit of the people of the United States. That is just what I have been contending for. But the Senator from Wisconsin would have them created for the benefit of the incumbents of the offices. He would say that of all the 70,000,000 people in this country no man or woman should be eligible to the Railway Mail Service if she or he has passed his or her thirty-fifth birthday, regardless of his or her intellectual or physical qualifications.

Mr. VILAS. Does the Senator from Nebraska think there ought to be no age fixed?

Mr. ALLEN. No age should be fixed so long as the individual has the physical and mental qualifications to discharge the duties. Why should there be an age fixed? Why not examine the applicant and inquire into his physical and his mental qualifications to discharge the duties of a particular office, and if he is found competent I would keep him there until he is as old as Methuselah, unless in the meantime he became incompetent or exhibited lack of memory in consequence of advancing age. Everybody beyond the age I have stated is disqualified.

Then we come to the other question which I put to the Senator from Wisconsin, and I am sorry to see that he is about to leave the Chamber at this time. I hope the Senator will remain.

Mr. VILAS. I will not leave if the Senator from Nebraska desires to ask anything of me.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it true that all persons who have passed the age of 45 years are ineligible, under the civil service, to any branch of the mail service?

Mr. VILAS. They are ineligible to new appointments.

Mr. ALLEN. To new appointments?

Mr. VILAS. Yes; that is the regulation adopted, because it was supposed desirable to secure in office persons of vigor and capacity, and not because the offices were designed for the benefit of those who seek them.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator says that because it was desirable to secure persons of vigor, physical vigor, I suppose he means, and mental vigor as well, an arbitrary rule has been laid down. Yet a youth who is so deformed physically that he has no chest development whatever, that he has no physical vigor whatever, may enter the service if he is under 45 years of age, while one who may be his superior in every conceivable respect, but who is over 45 years of age, is prevented by an arbitrary rule, which has the force of a statute, from enjoying the fruits of one of the offices of his country. I am not in favor of civil service of that kind.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the outrageous limitation in the Constitution of the United States which prohibits a man of the most brilliant powers, of the utmost accomplishments of education, of the greatest developments, even so great a man as William Pitt was at 24, from sitting in this august body.

Mr. ALLEN. I see nothing whatever in the argument. The only difference between the framers of the Constitution and the framers of the rules of the civil service is that the first believed it required a little age and mature judgment to make a man eligible to the Senate, while the Civil Service Commissioners look upon age and maturity as incapacitating a person for holding an office. That is the difference, and it is all the difference in the world. The framers of our Constitution said that a man must have reached a certain number of years before he is eligible to the House of Representatives, and another certain number of years before he is eligible to the Senate, and it was placed expressly upon the ground that these two bodies call for the judgment of men of mature years, men of some observation. But here the Senator from Wisconsin and his coadjutors upon the subject of civil-service reform say to us that fully one-half of the people of the United States, by virtue of having reached the age of 35 years, are disqualified for holding certain offices, and that all persons who have passed 45 years of age, regardless of their physical and mental vigor, are disqualified from holding any office in that branch of the Government which employs 150,000 people.

Mr. VILAS. Yes; even excluded from being drafted into the military service.

Mr. ALLEN. I have never seen but one war, and I think the Senator from Wisconsin has seen only one, although he is my senior in years, but I observed in that one war that when the Government was engaged in actual hostilities the exemption as to service was taken from the statute books. It was not observed. There was a regulation at the time that a man must be 18 years of age or over before being eligible to the military service. Yet, Mr. President, you know and every Senator present who has studied the history of this country knows that the great body of the fighting men on both sides was composed of men who entered the service under 18 years of age. The men who were brought in fighting contact on both sides were young men. The minimum and maximum restrictions were both removed. It is a good thing in time of peace, when there is no war and no prospect of war, to say that a man can not be drafted who is over 45 years of age and yet to wipe away that restriction in the event of war and draft him or admit him to the enlisted Army.

If this damnable course can be pursued, what is there to restrain the President of the United States and the Civil Service Commissioners from saying that no man who does not come from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts or the State of New York or the State of Wisconsin shall be eligible to any branch of the civil service? The same authority by which the executive department restricts on account of age a full-fledged, native-born American citizen who has reached the age of maturity would give the officials the right to restrict the particular territory from which the applicant should come. Yet the Senator from Wisconsin says this is democracy. Oh, if Hamilton could rise from his grave and meet the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, there would not be a hair's breadth of difference between them in their opinions upon this or any other great political question of which I have any knowledge.

Mr. VILAS. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me for a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. With pleasure.

Mr. VILAS. Yesterday the Senator had Jefferson's ghost to antagonize the Senator from Wisconsin, and now Hamilton's is on his side——

Mr. ALLEN. To embrace the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to remark to the Senator that the principles of civil-service reform in this Government had their origin you might almost say, with Mr. Jefferson. It was Mr. Jefferson, the first Democratic President, the founder of the Democratic party, who laid down the rule which excluded politics from consideration as an element that ought to control appointments. Is he honest? is he faithful? is he capable? were the rules which Mr. Jefferson laid down, and he himself refused to make removals generally from office, so that hardly a couple of dozen altogether was the number he made, finding when he took possession the entire offices of the Government in the possession of partisans of the other side.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Arkansas in the chair). The Senator from Massachusetts appeals to the Chair. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to make a little addition to the truth of history as to what is said about Mr. Jefferson? Mr. Jefferson wrote to Levi Lincoln, of Massachusetts, a citizen of the town where I reside, and afterwards his Attorney-General, that he did not find when he came into office an officer in the service of the Government, or an officer in the Army above the line who entertained the opinions of the Republican party, which was then the name of Mr. Jefferson's party, and that he understood that the Federalists had acted on the principle of excluding the friends of Mr. Jefferson's opinion from office, and he wanted to have a list sent to him of the persons who had been so appointed in the New England States by the Federalists, and said: "If you will let me know who those persons are you may leave the rest to me." He added that he hoped to restore the proper proportion and balance of officeholders to his party, and then he said: "I hope the time will come when the only question which can be put about the appointment to an office is: Is the man honest; is he capable; is he faithful to the Constitution?" So Mr. Jefferson's conception was rather a dividing equally of the spoils, if you call them spoils, between the two political parties than to make appointments to civil office without any consideration of political opinions. President Washington, if I may add one word, because I sympathize entirely with the Senator from Wisconsin, and I have no sympathy with the argument of the Senator from Nebraska——

Mr. ALLEN. I have never known the Senator from Massachusetts to have any sympathy with me or my arguments.

Mr. HOAR. I hope that I shall never agree with the Senator's arguments if he continues to pursue the line which he has been following, though I have great respect for him personally, I beg him to understand.

Mr. ALLEN. No doubt.

Mr. HOAR. President Washington said that he never should appoint an important officer in this Government whose opinions were opposed to that of his Administration.

Mr. VILAS. I think one word should be said in reference to what the Senator from Massachusetts says about Mr. Jefferson. He did say that he thought there ought to be something like an equilibrium in the officeholders, but that was in order to maintain and affirm the continuance of the principle. It was to prevent just what has been said with so much justice of the way in which the party to which the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts belongs dealt with civil-service reform; that they always stand up for it when they are out and turn the Democrats out when they come in, as they did with the Railway Mail Service in 1889. Mr. Jefferson insisted upon the equilibrium, not as an absolute rule, but as a kind of guarantee for the maintenance of those principles of appointment which he advocated and set forth and in which he did exclude the mere conception of politics as a reason for removal or for the prevention of a civil appointment. I am obliged to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, he speaks about the Railway Mail Service. The men who were turned out of the Railway Mail Service were Democrats, I suppose?

Mr. VILAS. I so understand.

Mr. HOAR. How did it happen when the Administration of President Harrison came in that they found all the clerks in the Railway Mail Service Democrats, the honorable Senator from Wisconsin having been Postmaster-General succeeding a Republican Administration? I do not think the President appoints the railway-mail clerks, but somebody must have turned out all the Republicans he found and put in Democrats.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Massachusetts has made a strictly partisan answer on that subject, without the slightest knowledge of the facts.

Mr. HOAR. I have not made an answer. I ask the Senator a question.

Mr. VILAS. I say it is characteristic of the Senator only when he exercises his partisan privileges.

Mr. HOAR. I asked the Senator a question; I did not make an answer at all. I asked him how it happens that all those Democrats were in when the great civil-service reformer now addressing the Senate was Postmaster-General, and were found there to be turned out by Harrison?

Mr. VILAS. I will state to the Senator what the facts were, and when the Senator hears them he will see that the implication in his question is a very unjust one. I am sure he will see it. Here happens to be at hand a statement of the appointments in the Railway Mail Service made during the time I occupied the office of Postmaster-General, and I will ask the Senator's particular attention to it. The whole number of clerks on the 7th of March, 1885, was 4,356. During the three years nearly—not quite, two years and six or seven months—up to the time of this report——

Mr. ALLEN. Would the Senator from Wisconsin just as lief read that after I conclude my remarks? I shall conclude in a moment or two.

Mr. VILAS. Will the Senator kindly allow me just to answer the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, and then I will be done with the subject? The number of clerks by increase of offices by the growth of the service was only 95, making a total on the 31st of October, 1887, of 4,851. By resignation, every one a voluntary resignation and no compelled resignations, there had been appointed to fill vacancies 1,309. There had been removed for disciplinary causes 805. There had been removed upon proof of gross partisanship in service, abusive action, 383, in the three years, and no more; so that at that time there were in the service 2,271 of the clerks who were in the service when I went into office. There had been added, including all the new appointments, only about 2,500.

Mr. HOAR. Those were all Democrats?

Mr. VILAS. I presume so; they were new appointments. Now, this required nearly three years of time, and in less than two months between 1,900 and 2,000 of them were turned out in 1889. No wonder that there is some difficulty. I have always felt that difficulty in having friends on our side in politics stand by the civil-service reform as it deserves.

Mr. ALLEN. For what cause were the 1,900 or 2,000 turned out?

Mr. VILAS. I suppose they happened to be there and were in the way.

Mr. ALLEN. I thought the civil service was efficient and kept a man in office.

Mr. VILAS. Oh, no; the Senator from Nebraska must know that there is not in the law the slightest qualification of the power of removal. Every officer who possesses the power of appointment possesses, notwithstanding the civil-service law, the same arbitrary and plenary power of removal.

Mr. ALLEN. A Democrat can remove a Republican and put in a Democrat?

Mr. VILAS. Precisely.

Mr. ALLEN. And vice versa?

Mr. VILAS. You add something. A Democrat can remove whom he will.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; and put in?

Mr. VILAS. As to putting in, he is obliged to select from a list of eligibles when the offices are in the classified service.

Mr. ALLEN. But suppose on the list of eligibles there happens to be 1 Democrat and 15 Republicans, can he put in the one Democrat?

Mr. VILAS. How, sir?

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose upon the list of eligibles there happens to be 1 Democrat, and the Cabinet officer happens to be a Democrat, can he skip over the 15 Republicans and put in the Democrat?

Mr. VILAS. The Senator knows, I suppose, that when a vacancy occurs a notice of the vacancy is given by the Department officer to the Civil Service Commissioners and they certify to that Department officer three names, accompanying them with their examination papers, and the choice will be made from those three names, unless he rejects the three, which he is at liberty to do.

Mr. ALLEN. And he can reject all?

Mr. VILAS. Yes; and call for a new certification.

Mr. ALLEN. And then he can come to a single Democrat and appoint him?

Mr. VILAS. No; the power of rejection, I believe, is limited. On the second certification he must make a choice.

Mr. ALLEN. As a matter of fact, he does not, and the Senator from Wisconsin knows it.

Mr. VILAS. Oh, I think, on the contrary, he invariably does. I do not know—I do not recall a single instance when I was in the Department—of a failure to select from the original certification.

Mr. ALLEN. If I were at liberty, I have the names and places, and I can now point to two instances where there has been a complete and absolute violation of the rule in two months.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. In the former Administration of Mr. Cleveland, when the civil-service law was in force as it is now, the head of the Pension Bureau stated before some committee that out of 85 clerks who had been appointed, either 82 or 83 were Democrats.

Mr. VILAS. That may have been before they were brought within the classified service.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no; the classified service took effect before the Democratic Administration.

Mr. VILAS. But there was a very great number of persons then outside of the classified service who are now within it.

Mr. TELLER. They were all within the classified service, and having had some experience in that Department, it has been to me a very great enigma how they could possibly do that thing.

Mr. ALLEN. When interrupted by the very interesting colloquy between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Wisconsin, I was speaking of the fact that there would be no difference whatever between the opinion of the Senator from Wisconsin and the opinion of Mr. Hamilton if it were possible for those two gentlemen to meet and converse on this occasion. That is true. The Federalism of Hamilton is the Democracy of VILAS. There is not the shadow of a distinction between them.

Now, the Senator says I likened him to Thomas Jefferson. No, Mr. President, I was not guilty of a breach of propriety so great as that. I said yesterday, and I repeat, that if Mr. Jefferson could be taken from his coffin and placed in the Senate Chamber and listen to the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin and the warm words of centralism and tyranny embraced in that speech he would be utterly amazed and utterly astonished that the Democracy of this age could have so degenerated from the Democracy of his age. And yet Jefferson has been made to do duty here more frequently than any other statesman of whom I have ever heard or read. Whenever it is essential to entertain these galleries or to entertain the Senate, Thomas Jefferson is trotted out in the Senate Chamber like a trick mule at a circus and made to perform all kinds of tricks for the entertainment of those present. I have heard him charged in this Chamber (and I want in my feeble words to defend his memory) with over one hundred inconsistencies on public questions. Yet I do not suppose there is a schoolboy who has read a common-school history of this country who does not know that Thomas Jefferson was the great Democrat of this country in his age, that he was thoroughly in accord with the principles of a democratic or republican form of government, that he believed then and taught the doctrine that the power in this country should rest in the people and be diffused as far as possible among all classes of people. However, the Senator from Wisconsin, undertaking to square himself with Jefferson and make himself a Jeffersonian Democrat, says that really Mr. Jefferson was the first great civil-service reformer in this country. Mr. Jefferson not only preached, but he practiced the doctrine that to the victor belongs the spoils.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside that the Senate may continue the consideration of the bill now before the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, no person taught in plainer language than Thomas Jefferson the doctrine of rotation in office. It was understood among the framers of our Constitution and the fathers of this Republic that the Government would be made secure by placing responsibility upon every citizen. It was not supposed at that time that within less than one hundred and thirty years from the laying of the foundation of this great Republic a class of beings would present themselves who would claim superiority in all respects, and who would claim the right to rule to the exclusion of the masses. It was a Republic, sir, and a republic means that every citizen, naturalized and native, who lives upon the soil of the country where it exists has an equal right to participate in the administration of its affairs.

Now, the Senator from Wisconsin would change all that. He would erect upon this continent an aristocracy in the administration of affairs of the Post-Office and in the administration of every other branch of the Government. He would exclude one-half if not two-thirds of the population of this country from participating in the affairs of their Government. Yet when the Senator from Wisconsin (I regret that he is now out of his seat, and I shall not say as much as I would if he were here) comes to the question of a Democratic Administration turning out Republicans and a Republican Administration turning out Democrats he wants to hedge a little; he does not meet it with his usual frankness and fullness.

The truth is, Mr. President, that offensive partisanship was invented in 1885 for the express purpose of turning out a lot of Republicans who were holding office under the civil service. What does offensive partisanship mean? Has any man ever defined what constitutes an offensive partisan? Because a person holding an office is not in sympathy with the Administration he is an offensive partisan. That is all it means, and that has been held sufficient to turn out persons occupying positions under the civil-service law, notwithstanding they supposed themselves protected by that law, enacted for the benefit of the public service of the country. The truth is that Democrats are constantly turning out Republicans by the hundreds and thousands in violation of this law. A Republican Administration turned out Democrats by hundreds and thousands in spite of the provisions of this law, and in spite of the Civil Service Commission. I have had occasion to show during this discussion that during the present Administration when one member of the Civil Service Commission saw fit to entertain and express an opinion of his own that did not accord with the Chief Executive he himself was politically decapitated.

Now, Mr. President, one word more and I will leave this bill finally, so far as I am concerned. I do not want to be misunderstood on the question of a sensible administration of the service of this Government. I believe that men should be chosen with a view of their fitness to occupy important positions, but I do not believe that a man must have been a graduate of Yale or Harvard or some other college or university to hold a one-hundred-dollar fourth-class post-office in the State of Nebraska or the State of Maryland or the State of Tennessee. I want a man chosen for his fitness, not only his fitness in a technical educational view, but his fitness of head, his fitness of heart. He must be in perfect sympathy with the principles upon which our Government is founded. He must be a patriotic, law-abiding citizen, reasonably competent to discharge the duties of the office. However much our Democratic and Republican brethren here and elsewhere may say they are in favor of this so-called sham civil-service reform, we know and the world knows that it is a mere false pretense which is never or at least scarcely ever observed. Sir, I believe that if my party is correct in the principles it advocates, and if it wins the great contest in this country for the mastery of the nation, from Chief Executive down, its worthy, its intelligent, and its competent membership should reap the reward that follows such a victory.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not wish to take much of the time of the Senate in discussing this question, but I should like to say one or two words in the interest of the truth of history.

I have been a very humble and a very constant supporter of the policy of civil-service reform from the beginning. I made a very full and thorough discussion in Massachusetts of the subject in 1876 when the question was new, and I think I have known the history of the reform perhaps as well as anybody.

Now, the Senator from Nebraska wants to know what good has been accomplished, what there is better to-day under our Government than there was twenty-five or thirty years ago. I can tell him, and I think every Senator within the sound of my voice and every intelligent observer of the course of American political history will agree to what I say.

Under the old Democratic régime a large portion of the citizens of this country were inexorably excluded from all office under the Administration of the country. Mr. Jefferson's famous sentence, which has just been quoted and which has been so often quoted without its connection, "Is he honest, is he capable, is he faithful to the Constitution?" had given way to the single rule of selection, "Is he faithful to slavery?" As was well said by Mr. Sumner from his seat in this Chamber, neither George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, nor Thomas Jefferson, with their known opinions on that subject, could have been appointed to the humblest office under the Democratic Administration of the Government.

I think that excluded a large portion of the citizens of this country from an honorable public service, quite as much as a distinction based on intelligence or on ignorance. They were followed after the war by a Republican Administration. The Administration of President Grant came in at a time when the country was beginning to be pacified. The Republicans established a rule as inexorable, that nobody but a Republican should receive an office under the Government, and the whole Democratic party substantially were excluded. But very soon it went a great deal further, and during the second term of President Grant and quite largely during the first term, for the rule requiring party fidelity there was substituted a rule requiring fidelity to the fortunes of some individual and ambitious chieftain. In the factions which grew up, and always will grow up in a dominant and powerful party, the civil service of the country was made an instrument not for influencing elections against the Democrats, but for raising and reenforcing the cohorts of men who were devoted to the fortunes of certain political chieftains who got the ear of the Executive.

In my own State you could not read the morning papers without dread that you would read of the removal of some brave, honest, upright, capable Republican soldier, and that there would be put in his place some petty, disreputable tool of an ambitious chieftain. And that is the inevitable result of the instrument of the political patronage in the service of party. No party can prevent it on the principle which the Senator from Nebraska stated very long. It is notorious under all parties, it is notorious to-day, it has been equally notorious under Republican rule, that whenever a Presidential election or Presidential nomination is approaching men are appointed to the civil service of the country in the interest of this, that, or the other candidate for the nomination. If the President of the United States is a candidate for renomination, you will find the whole army of officeholders drilled and disciplined to advance his interests, and I think few men will get appointments who are not in sympathy with the Executive as to the selection of his successor. If he is not a candidate, you will find that the instrumentalities will be used to further the ambition of some person in one of the Executive Departments.

Mr. President, instead of that, which every patriotic man will agree was vicious, bringing republican institutions into contempt, the rule of a selection based upon intelligence and fitness, so far as they can be ascertained by an examination of the appointee, has been substituted; and I believe the general assent of the American people has justified the change.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] thinks this great and admirable reform is due to President Cleveland. Well, that Senator has been for a good part of his life an admirer of the present Executive of the United States ex officio, and he seems to have retained the official habits of an executive officer since he has been in the Senate. I do not find the evidence of that great service to this cause. The law was passed before he came into power, and I think the men who passed this law are entitled to a little of the credit of the reform which the law accomplished.

The President bravely announced in his inaugural address, in the beginning of his Administration, his adhesion to the doctrine of civil-service reform, and, as the Senator from Wisconsin has conceded, he had not been very long in office before some 2,500 employees in the Railway Mail Service were displaced; he had not been very long in office before some 32 collectors had been removed solely for political reasons, the whole consular service of the country was changed, and the President seemed to me to have shrunk and flinched from the brave doctrine that he had advanced as if he had been frightened almost at the sound of his own voice. Like Fear, in the "Ode to the Passions,"

> First Fear his hand, its skill to try,
> Amid the chords bewilder'd laid,
> And back recoil'd, he knew not why,
> E'en at the sound himself had made.

Mr. President, there are three men who ought to have the credit of this great accomplishment and reform in the civil service of the country, and I think I know whereof I speak when I name them. The first is Mr. Dorman B. Eaton, of New York, a man, I believe, not connected or affiliated with any political party. Early, when the whole country seemed to be given up to this vicious method which I have mentioned, Mr. Eaton called the attention of his countrymen to the matter. He studied the fashions and habits which prevailed in other countries, he spoke at public meetings, and he published a book in which he outlined the scheme which has been adopted finally with so much success.

Next to Mr. Eaton comes, in my judgment, my honorable friend from Connecticut, the senior Senator, General HAWLEY, who, as chairman of the Committee on Civil Service, framed and carried through and defended against all antagonists on the floor of the Senate the provisions of the present civil-service law, even when some other champions had their hearts fail and were in favor of incorporating in that law some exceedingly vicious provisions which would have destroyed its whole efficacy. With the single exception of Mr. Dorman B. Eaton, of New York, whatever credit is due to this great revolution in the political habits of this country is due to JOSEPH R. HAWLEY.

The third man, and the only man who deserves to be named in the same breath with either of these, is Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, of New York, who was a bold, courageous, intelligent, most effective and efficient administrator of the law when he was in charge of its operation. I do not think Mr. Cleveland's name, though he has done many good things in his Administration, deserves to be written up very high on that scroll.

It is not agreeable to go into statistics, but take the matter of the Railway Mail Service. A man who had stood very high in the mail service of the country, told me that when that first Administration of Mr. Cleveland went out of office in his Department he should think 80 per cent of the men who had been appointed to the Railway Mail Service had been bartenders. I think that was an exaggeration. I can not give the name of the person who was my informant, but I remember very well he was a person who held a high office in the Administration. I spoke once about it to the Postmaster-General who succeeded under Mr. Harrison, and he said he thought that was an exaggerated statement, but that they came from the bartender class very largely. That is what he said about it. I know that in the New England States the Railway Mail Service was so made up when President Harrison came into office that it became necessary to make a sweep of the men who were in it, and to put in men for whom the Department could vouch and who would be competent.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Massachusetts can not possess that knowledge by any possibility in the world, for the fact is entirely different.

Mr. HOAR. That is the result of my observation and information. I, of course, can not possess it as knowledge, nor can the Senator from Wisconsin possess the contrary as knowledge.

Mr. VILAS. I think I can very much better than the Senator from Massachusetts, who makes such a sweeping affirmation. The Railway Mail Service at the end of that first Administration of Mr. Cleveland was certainly twice as effective and twice as well managed as when the Administration began.

Mr. HOAR. That is not my information, and it is not the public judgment in my part of the country. That is all I can say on that subject.

Mr. VILAS. The public judgment may have been misinformed, as the Senator has been.

Mr. HOAR. That may be.

Mr. VILAS. But it will be very easy to establish the proposition by men of the Senator's own party who were familiar with the service.

Mr. HOAR. I make this expression of my belief on the subject as my contribution to this debate so far as it relates to that proposition.

Mr. VILAS. I wish we could have some facts instead of beliefs.

Mr. HOAR. I do not question the sincerity and the ability of the Senator from Wisconsin as an advocate of this interesting reform. The reform has been largely accomplished and is going on; to use a cant phrase, "it has come to stay"; it expresses the principles and what are to be the policies of this country in the future.

I think my honorable friend, as I said when he was out of the Chamber just now, was for some years an admirer of that Chief Magistrate ex officio, and the official habits of a Cabinet officer have not entirely deserted him now.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] says that 90 per cent of the American people are disfranchised. It does not seem to me that that is a very sound and correct way of putting it. If there are a hundred thousand offices, with a population of 70,000,000, every one of the rest of the 70,000,000 who is not appointed is in one sense disfranchised. The appointment is made under our Constitution by the President and Senate, the President alone, or the heads of Departments, and they must have some principle of selection.

The Senator from Nebraska says that if the Populist party come into power they ought to have—he did not use the phrase "spoils of office," but the officers ought to be taken, if I understood him, from that party.

Mr. ALLEN. No, Mr. President; I did not say that. The Senator from Massachusetts misunderstood me. I said if my party should come into power—and I was speaking generally—that I believed it would be just to them, if their principles were correct, to fill the offices of this country from the membership of that party who were qualified to discharge the duties of the offices. That is my position now, and shall be my position henceforth.

Mr. HOAR. Then the offices are to be filled from the Populist party if they come into power and agree with the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly; just exactly, if the Senator will permit, as the Republican party fills the offices with its membership when it is in power, or the Democrats fill them when they are in power, entirely regardless of anything in the civil-service rules.

Mr. HOAR. So, according to the Senator from Nebraska, if the Populist party comes into power, all Democrats and all Republicans are to be disfranchised for four years.

Mr. ALLEN. No; not at all. The Senator does not do my argument justice. What I said was that this arbitrary rule, which does not permit a man over 35 years of age to enter into the Railway Mail Service, or over 45 years of age to enter any branch of the service, practically deprives him of his rights as a citizen, which no amount of qualification, mental, physical, or moral, can overcome. If those rules were not enforced, then a man would always be eligible by fitness to any position within the gift of the Government.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Railway Mail Service needs men possessed of great mental quickness and capacity, in order that the service may be promptly discharged. It needs men possessed of physical endurance, in order that the night work in traveling over long distances by rail may go on without interruption. We must deal with these things on general rules; and is it not a better general rule to say that the men whose mental intelligence has been discovered by such tests as the examiners can contrive, and whose physical vigor is assured by their being within a certain age—although some very capable persons may be excluded in that way—is not that, on the whole, a better general rule than the rule that they shall be excluded from office because of their political opinions, or than the worse rule, which I spoke of just now, that they shall be selected in order that they may render political service in advancing the fortunes of some ambitious and unscrupulous political chieftain?

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HOAR. I do.

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose a person under 35 years of age is found who possesses the requisite qualifications to enter the Railway Mail Service, and another man who is 37 or 40 years of age is superior to him in point of intellect, superior to him in point of physical vigor, superior to him in every respect to discharge the duties of that particular office, should the fact that he has passed the thirty-fifth milestone of life deprive him of that privilege?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if such a careful physical personal examination of every applicant could be made, it might be that the answer to the Senator's question would be in the negative; but in the management of this vast business you have to go by general rules; and the Senator himself, I think, is in favor of saying that some of these officers shall be selected from the place from which they come. Party platforms say that in certain other classes of offices men shall not be sent even to a Territory who come from another part of the country, however superior they may be found to be.

Mr. ALLEN. That has been violated right along.

Mr. HOAR. That is another question. I am talking about what are correct principles, not whether the Democratic or Republican parties violate the rule. We are trying to get at correct principles in our legislation and our rules on this subject.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator a question in the line of what he is saying?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. I ask whether the civil-service laws do not require and make obligatory a certain territorial distribution of appointments, which, of course, was not obligatory where the appointing power was left to put all the offices in one locality, the District of Columbia, for instance?

Mr. HOAR. Unquestionably; and therefore the public interests require that the consideration of residence, which gives the influence of an Administration to satisfy the people with it, and all that, shall be considered even to some extent to depart from the principle of getting the very best and ablest men. In the same way we wanted to rescue this Government, with its more than 100,000 offices, a number now largely increased, from having the offices created to serve the people used to bribe them, from having men turn Democrat or turn Republican or turn Populist in order to get an office as their reward. We wanted to rescue these people from having at every election and every nomination an army of officeholders swarming about the places of meeting, or an army of expectant and hungry office seekers swarming about the places where the will of the people is to be declared in convention or in caucus, and we wanted to rescue them—which was one of the most corrupting evils—from the most vicious and indefensible conditions that ever existed under a free government, which excited the astonishment of intelligent foreigners who visited this country. We wanted, moreover, to rescue the United States from the still further and more debasing evil of having officeholders made a drilled and disciplined army at the service, at the beck and call, of ambitious political chieftains who could get the ear of the President. That was the best thing that one hundred years of free Government has been able so far to bring to pass in this Republic.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish a sentence or two and I will.

It was the running sore; it was the offensive stench in the nostrils; it was the disgrace, the degradation, the shame, the infamy, of the American people; and the men who undertook this reform put a stop to it, and if they did not get the best possible substitute, they got one which was a hundredfold, a millionfold, better than that which it displaced. They said, "We will have the President of the United States, in the exercise of his power, and the heads of Departments, in the exercise of their powers, take men whose physical and mental vigor will be assured by some general lines and limits as to age; we will have men whose intelligence and education in this Republic—at the basis of which popular education lies—is ascertained by some such examination as we can give, and from them the selection shall be made." That may not be a perfect scheme; it may be improved, it may be bettered by experience, and under the great temptations which beset a party leader in the Cabinet or in the Presidential chair it may have been violated. I think it has been under both Administrations. I could tell some stories about both Administrations, if I saw fit, to show that it has been violated; but on the whole and in the main President Cleveland and his Cabinet have honestly and faithfully carried out the law, and in the main President Harrison and his heads of Departments honestly and faithfully carried out the law, with some exceptions. But when you come to write the history of this great reform, the names which should be written in indelible characters and are entitled to the credit of it are the names of Dorman B. Eaton, JOSEPH R. HAWLEY, and Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] twice said in his remarks, as I understood him, that my respect and regard for the President of the United States were ex officio.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator did not take that seriously. I meant it as a good-natured jest or rally or banter, and I should be very sorry if the Senator supposed I meant seriously that he had anything more than an ordinary admiration of a man for his chief. If the Senator objects to the expression, I will withdraw it with great pleasure.

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from Massachusetts says that, I have nothing more to say than that I lament my incapacity to follow the Senator's joke.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, since the few remarks I made yesterday morning upon this subject there has been a good deal of general debate and there have been many references to some of the statements which I saw fit to make in the course of my remarks and some criticism of the deductions I drew from the facts I stated. I shall ask the attention of the Senate a very few moments in reply to them.

First, before going to the merits of the question, I desire to say that on yesterday the urbane and distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations with great propriety called my attention to the fact that I was mistaken in my assumption that the superintendents of the different stations were recognized by law.

Mr. ALLISON. I was mistaken in that. I have the law before me, and intended to call attention to it before the Senator closed his observations.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Does the Senator mean to imply that by any possibility he is mistaken? [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. I will say that the law of 1889 does provide for certain stations, and I was mistaken in saying that it did not.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That disposes of so much of the question, Mr. President. I should dislike myself, however, to take that as precedent, for I have no doubt that out of a thousand given instances the Senator from Iowa would be sure to be right on a question of this kind and I would be equally certain to be wrong. [Laughter.]

The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], in a very calm and fair summary of the arguments which could be made upon either side of this question, yesterday inadvertently made one statement which I think ought to be corrected; that is, the Senator assumed that this was legislation upon an appropriation bill; that this was legislation which should stand by itself, and ought not, in the close of a session, to be attached to the Post-Office appropriation bill. I desire to call his attention and the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is not new legislation at all, nor does it assume to be new legislation, nor does it enact into law a single provision, nor does it do anything else in the world than apply solely to the expenditure of an appropriation contained in the bill itself. The effect of the appropriation is to recognize the law as it stands and the authority of the Postmaster-General to make these changes, simply providing that when the changes are made the funds heretofore applicable as salaries for postmasters at offices which have been consolidated into stations shall in turn be made applicable to clerk hire, and therefore payable out of the fund of the appropriation to be devoted to the payment of clerk hire. Therein, Mr. President, is an eminently fitting and proper amendment to be placed in this bill and not fitted to go elsewhere. I suggest that the only amendment which touches this question and which is not germane to this appropriation bill is the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations itself, which provides that hereafter county seats shall not be included in consolidated post-offices.

That does not touch the appropriation; that declares an amendment to existing law; that is an attempt to put upon the statute book something which has nothing in the world to do with an appropriation; and it is proposed to be placed in this bill, where there is no chance to adequately discuss it, as an amendment to the time-honored existing law—an amendment which limits and curtails the power of the Postmaster-General of the United States, and which in no wise whatever affects, or is intended to affect, the appropriation.

Mr. President, in some of the suggestions which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] made yesterday I can not agree. I do not agree with him that the corner grocery is the corner stone of the Republic. I believe, Mr. President, that we rest upon a higher and nobler basis. I believe that efficiency in the public service and a separation of politics from the administration of public affairs is a far better, wiser, and stronger foundation for free government than the hope of petty political patronage, which political leaders can parcel out on promises for votes and for efforts in different Presidential elections.

With much that the Senator from Maryland said I fully agree. The Senator's reference to the practice which has recently grown up, of Cabinet officers leaving their positions of duty and making speeches around the country on the tariff or the currency, was to my mind, a proper remark and a proper caution. With great wisdom, I think, the Senator from Maryland called the attention of the country to the abuses of their offices which is now going on among Cabinet officials of the Administration. One of them, the last I heard of him, was barnstorming down in Georgia in favor of gold monometallism and what he saw fit to call "honest money." I should myself have called attention to it earlier in the session had it not been for the fact that he is better away than here [laughter] so far as his public duties and his performance of them is concerned.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do.

Mr. HILL. What is the point the Senator from Colorado is making? Does the Senator contend that a Cabinet officer has no right to make such speeches throughout the country to the neglect of his duties, or is the point that he has no right to make political speeches at all?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I take it that he has no right to make them to the neglect of his duties.

Mr. HILL. That is the point of the criticism?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Up to this time.

Mr. HILL. I assume that that must be so, because it has been the custom heretofore for Cabinet officials to make political speeches. It has been the custom of Mr. Gladstone in England to speak for his party on all occasions. Lord Salisbury has recently been speaking for his party in all parts of England. I have not heard any criticism based on the fact that they were neglecting their duties. While we may not agree with all the speeches made by members of the Cabinet, I hardly think they have been neglecting their duties, have they?

Mr. WOLCOTT. The administration of this country under a republican form of government has extended for a period of something over a hundred years, and if precedents are to be recalled to justify the conduct of Cabinet officers of the present Administration, I suggest that they be cited from their predecessors in office and not from the practice in Great Britain, where members of the English ministry are themselves members of legislative bodies and are expected to go upon the hustings to justify their action. The analogy does not lie between the two classes of officials.

I do say that at the present time when it has appeared before this body that so far as lands in Utah are concerned, which we are now seeking to have divided, where Congress has acted and the Secretary of the Interior has seen fit to seek only how to evade the solemn duty which Congress has put upon him, when in the distribution of the public lands of the United States, and as to the Pacific railroads, where Congress has acted and the Secretary of the Interior has declined to issue patents to homesteaders who are entitled to them, and when the last Congress passed an act opening the Ute Reservation to public settlement and the Secretary of the Interior has week after week and month after month seen fit only so to exercise the prerogatives of his great office as to make the law impotent and valueless—I say under such circumstances he may just as well be making stump speeches in Georgia as to be sitting in his executive office, the more so, Mr. President, as the arguments which he is unloading upon the public in Georgia are making converts to the cause of bimetallism by the scores wherever he sees fit to make them. With that suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, I am in full accord.

The very lack of attention to their duties which may characterize the Cabinet officials is all the more reason why we should take from them the power to make these appointments. If they do not attend to their duties, how are they wisely to exercise the power of appointment? The Senator spoke as if we exercised the power of appointment of postmasters. Nobody knows better than does the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] that his own personal wishes, the wishes his constituents expressed through him—and when I speak of his personal wishes I speak only of his wishes as voicing the sentiment of the best of his constituents—count absolutely for nothing in the making of those appointments. If that be true as to offices where the Senate does not confirm, how wise would be a provision of law declaring that those men shall pass under examination and that, when fit for office, their names must be accepted by the officer to whom they are presented, robbing him of the power to reward political adherents or punish political enemies by giving them the spoils of office.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Colorado will permit me right here. He is so entirely unfair to me in this discussion that I am amazed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I beg the Senator's pardon. Have I not quoted him correctly?

Mr. GORMAN. No; not at all in any statement which the Senator has attempted to quote.

This, now, is the third time that the Senator from Colorado has intimated that my attitude upon this matter is because of the desire for patronage, and yet the Senator knows the fact, as no other Senator in this body does, that in this controversy I have resented and rejected the intimation that it was the office I sought. It is the principle.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I certainly do, and in nothing that I have said have I offered a suggestion that the Senator from Maryland is affected in his view in the slightest degree by the question of appointments, nor have I suggested, nor would I suggest, for I do not believe it to be true, that the question of the personnel of the appointments would in the slightest degree affect the judgment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I must disavow that, for I certainly do not intend to be so understood.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Colorado in the very sentence when I interrupted him intimated, in fact he said distinctly, that it is the desire to reward men for political service that I am contending for.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, no, Mr. President. My language will not bear such a construction. What I did say was that I did not think the offices should be so distributed as to constitute reward for good service or punishment for service that was not friendly to the particular chief who might appoint them, and I spoke only from public repute—and this is the only suggestion which is personally applicable to him—I only spoke of those statements which for years have been going about in the public press when I said I believed that nobody knew better than the Senator from Maryland to how great an extent the patronage of power could be used to punish enemies and to reward friends.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; because I have stood from the time of my entrance here into public service denouncing the theory which the Senator advocates so broadly—to place everything under the civil service. Men who advocate civil service, not tolerant of honest opinions entertained on the other side, have made it their business in the public press, on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere in Congress to denounce men who have honest views upon this subject as spoilsmen. I have held a seat upon this floor since 1881. Not a dozen appointments of postmasters in the State of Maryland have ever been made upon my recommendation. I have in every case taken the will of the people of the office, and yet gentlemen who have become converts to the civil-service reform rise in the Senate and intimate that it is because we want patronage that we take this view. I resent it. The Senator from Colorado and no other Senator who advocates this proposition shall make such an intimation again without an indignant denial on my part.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I can not understand what the English language can mean if the Senator from Maryland assumes that there has been any intimation made in any of the remarks which I have uttered here to the effect that his vote or his feelings are influenced in the slightest degree because of failure of success in receiving appointments. I never suggested it; I never intimated it; I never meant it. I was suggesting at the very moment when the Senator from Maryland interrupted me that wherever he has voiced an expression respecting an appointment it has been only to represent the wishes of the best of his constituents. To that extent, and to that extent only, so far as I know, does the Senator from Maryland go. But the statement I make loses none of its force when I say that it is unfitting and unseemly that those appointments which should be based on merit are based upon politics, and politics of the lower sort.

I do not care to go into a reply to the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] as to the question of the power of the Postmaster-General. I believe it to be undoubted; I believe it to be supported by statute; but I do not propose to take the few minutes remaining before we vote upon the bill to discuss that question. Nor can I answer the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who seems to think that a department store is the great curse of the country and the devilfish which ought to be killed. The people who pass civil-service examinations have been spoken of as being mere Department clerks, mere machines. How long has it been a reproach and a byword that a young man should fit himself for private life or for public station? The intrusion into a country community of a young man fitted to fulfill the functions of collector and distributor of the mails is not an offense to a community. He marries and makes his home there. He is fitted for citizenship. Wherein is it a crying shame that such a man should go to a community to act as postmaster for a people or as agent at the place where its mail is to be distributed and collected? His establishment, wherever it may be, may be equally the resort of the citizens of the town, and they will find there a man whom the Government has tested, whose integrity is vouched for, a man whom the people know will not rob them of their letters or of the contents thereof, or intrude into their private affairs; a man fitted by education, by training, and by habits to take care of the interests which he is supposed to represent.

For my part I should never care to cast my lot in the line of clerkships and salaried office, but this country is full of splendid citizens who work for other people for an annual compensation. It is not a crime on their part that in the fortunes of life the prizes have not come to them. It is no reproach that they seek an honest livelihood at Government pay or in the employ of others, and it is no fault of theirs or of the parents who reared them that they attended the public schools of the country and fitted themselves to hold those offices with which they are intrusted.

This amendment may go by the board; it does not meet the approval of the Committee on Appropriations, and we shall hear the last of it when we vote upon it within a few moments. But the reform is just as sure to come as succeeding Congresses are to meet. You do not frighten a country community by telling them that a new clergyman is coming to town to take the place of the old clergyman, who is dead. They do not propose to stone him from the community because he was not brought up among them. It is just so when a proper young man, qualified for citizenship, takes his place in one of those communities, near somebody to supervise his work and vouch for his ability and see that he performs the duties of his office with faithfulness and with regard to public duty. You will find an improvement in the public service; you will find the public contented and satisfied, and you will find this great class of business offices of the country removed from the depraved surroundings of partisan politics.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I simply rise to suggest that there is a possibility that the civil service itself may be corrupt; that you have not the safeguards to prevent corruption growing up under the civil-service system. I will not charge that it has occurred, but I will state what might occur. The head of a Department might remove two or three hundred clerks, because the power of removal is unlimited. The Civil Service Commission might, if they were sufficiently subservient to the Administration, put through a batch of new applicants who were the pets of a person whom they desired to please, and they might be put into the places of those who were removed.

I have been told that that is the constant process; that it is going on constantly. The heads of Departments remove clerks for want of something to do, for want of business. That is going on constantly by the hundred. Fresh ones come in, and I think if you will go around through the Departments you will find that all those last put in office belong to the existing Administration, whichever it may be, and that each Administration is shoving out the old clerks and filling the places with new ones. That that has been going on has been confessed here by both sides in the debate. Senators instance the removal of hundreds and thousands in a particular service, the Railway Mail Service, where 2,000 were removed in a very short time, a few weeks, and another crop put in.

The only difference, it seems to me, between the working of this system and the working of the former system is that in the present system it is consolidated in the hands of the Executive Departments, and it is there for use to control Congress and to control other influences. It has augmented the power of the Executive more than a hundredfold. It is taking power from the people to consolidate the Government, and the very nature of the thing is for the party in power, through the Executive, to have control of all offices. He can remove employees by hundreds, as is done, and can bring in through the civil-service system a new set and put them in the places. It is constantly done.

When you tell me the men who compose the Civil Service Commission are different from any other three men and that they do not send in the names of those who will please the Administration, you tell me that human nature has changed. They have done it and will do it. They send in a number of names, two or three or four, and there is always a favorite in the number whom the Civil Service Commission may know and whom the head of the Department, who appoints, may know all about; and it so happens, whether they know it or not, that the man gets in whom the Administration in power favors, and nobody else gets in through this machine. Republicans do not get in during a Democratic Administration nor do Democrats get in under a Republican Administration. But this is a proposition to take power from the people. The power is taken away from the representatives of the people and is lodged in the central power of the Administration, which controls legislation.

Do Senators believe that in the extra session the Executive could have changed a two-thirds vote for the people's money into a vote for the Rothschilds' money if the Representatives of the people had had a voice in appointments, if that power had not been consolidated so that it could be used for the appointment of hundreds in consideration of influence? When before could an Executive have made such changes as were made in the extra session. When before, I say, could it ever have occurred in both Houses of Congress? The sentiment was absolutely changed. We all feel the power of the Executive, and the Executive power is in consolidation. It is now proposed to extend the consolidation, to break up the system of post-offices so dear to the people of the United States, where their neighbors are charged with the duty, persons in whom they have confidence. A system that has been so benign, so useful, and so universally applied for a hundred years is to be attacked and is to be brought into the maelstrom of power and corruption, consolidating the whole patronage into the hands of one man.

When and where did one man come to be better than the whole of the American people? When and where did all virtue center in one man? Is that the theory of our Government? The theory of our Government is that everybody is better than anybody; that everybody is wiser than anybody. The theory here is that a particular individual can do it better and cheaper than the people themselves. I am opposed to taking power from the people and lodging it in anyone's hands. Senators say the service will be improved. A monarch may be good when he is born, but few have died who were not bad before the end of their days. A man may be good when he comes into office, but power is dangerous and will corrupt. The system of civil-service reform places power in the Executive to make all appointments and all removals in secret. Public opinion regulated it while public opinion had influence, but the whole thing now is taken out of public opinion. Three instruments of the President are put in charge. They work in the dark. They designate who shall be appointed. Do you not suppose that those instruments of power will be as subservient in this country as in any other? When and where did the instruments of power, when and where did the subservient appointees of a monarch or a despot ever act independently or for the public good? The Civil Service Commissioners are simply doing the will of the President, and if it be the will of the Executive that the patronage of the Government shall be used to control votes, to carry out jobs, it will be done. It is consolidation of power against the distribution of power. Our Constitution unfortunately consolidated power too much. But the practice of the Government under it made this a benign Republic.

Now it is proposed to change every feature of the practice of our Government which we as American citizens love and admire. I am opposed to a proposition to change the administration of this Government from the simple democracy which it was designed to be to a consolidated despotism, which designing men are attempting to create out of it. I tell you, and I wish to have it recorded here, that the civil-service machine is sapping the foundation of American liberty. It is the first step toward concentrating all power in the hands of one man and taking from the people the rights and liberties which it was intended should be vested in them under our form of government. It is a dangerous arm of despotism. It will be filled with fraud. There will be fraud, unfairness, injustice, and bad administration as the result of the whole experiment. I wish to have that recorded here now as my solemn opinion, after ample reflection and after some observation.

Mr. HALE. I have been absent from the Chamber, at work in committee. I ask to have the parliamentary attitude of the question stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that there are several amendments pending as touching this matter. If the Senator from Maine desires it, the Secretary will state the pending amendment.

Mr. HALE. I ask whether there is an amendment pending which contains what is called the 5-mile limit?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment pending is the one proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]. The Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] withdrew his amendment, as the Chair remembers.

Mr. HALE. Then there is no amendment pending to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; there is, Mr. President.

Mr. HALE. If there is, I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that no amendment is pending save the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HALE. I am glad to yield.
Mr. ALLEN. Very well; let it go.
Mr. GORMAN. Let us have a vote.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is that proposed by the Senator from Colorado.
Mr. HALE. There has been no amendment offered (I speak because of my absence heretofore and ignorance of the situation) which involves what is known as the 5-mile limit from the boundaries of a city.
Mr. HILL. I will inform the Senator from Maine if he will allow me.
Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from New York.
Mr. HILL. Yesterday afternoon the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] offered an amendment which confined the establishment of substations to the corporate limits of the city or town where the particular office is located. Subsequently I offered an amendment extending it to 5 miles outside. Later it was deemed wiser that there should first be a vote directly upon the proposition offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], because these amendments would more properly follow afterwards. I think that is the idea, and in consideration of that the amendment was withdrawn.
Mr. GORMAN. Notice was given of its withdrawal.
Mr. HILL. Notice was given of its withdrawal. I suppose the idea is that we shall vote in the very near future upon the principal amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, which is now the only one pending, because if it shall be voted down the phraseology of the amendment would have to be changed a trifle.
Mr. HALE. The explanation is entirely satisfactory to me, and I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate at present. If an amendment is offered involving the 5-mile limit I should desire then to have something to say, perhaps under the five-minute rule; but I am entirely willing now that a vote shall be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Secretary informs the Chair that the words "superintendent or" were eliminated during the proceedings yesterday, and there is some controversy now, so the Chair learns, as to whether those words should be restored. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] expressed a desire that the words "superintendent or" should be restored.
Mr. PALMER. I ask that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado be read.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.
The SECRETARY. After line 11, on page 2, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That whenever, by order of the Postmaster-General, any post-office is consolidated with any office so as to become a station or substation of the same, the salary of the superintendent or clerk in charge of such station or substation may then be paid out of the appropriation.

Mr. BUTLER. Would an amendment not germane to the one now pending be in order at this time?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina can present the amendment, and if any point of order is raised the matter will be passed upon.
Mr. BUTLER. I send forward the amendment and ask that it may be read. It is to come in at the end of line 2, on page 4.
The SECRETARY. At the end of line 2, on page 4, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That $50,000 of this amount be used to defray the expense of experiments in rural free delivery under the direction of the Postmaster-General, and that the amount heretofore appropriated for this purpose and still unexpended be available for said experiments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from North Carolina that the particular paragraph in the bill to which his amendment has reference is not now before the Senate.
Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that his amendment will be in order very soon, immediately after the pending amendment is disposed of.
Mr. BUTLER. Then I will call it up later.
Mr. ALLISON. In response to the inquiry of the Chair, suggested by the clerks at the desk, I will state that I have no objection to the reinsertion of the words "superintendent or," as when I asked that those words should be stricken out I was of opinion that this class of officers was not known to the law. I find by an act of March 2, 1889, there is provision for superintendents of stations, although I know of no provision of law which authorizes a superintendent of a substation. But I take it for granted that no Postmaster-General fit for his place would think of having a superintendent for both a station and a substation, and so I make no point upon that.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Iowa to consent to the restoration of those words?
Mr. ALLISON. I do.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection. The words will be inserted.
Mr. ALLISON. Now, I want to read the amendment in order to see what it proposes and the extent of it:

Provided—

The word "however" is stricken out also—

Provided, That whenever, by order of the Postmaster-General, any post-office is consolidated with any office so as to become a station or substation of the same, the compensation of the superintendent or clerk in charge of such station or substation may then be paid out of this appropriation.

Unless there is some hidden meaning or some ulterior project involved in the amendment to make lawful that which is now prohibited by law, the amendment has no significance whatever. It does not add to or take from the Postmaster-General any authority he has now by law. The discussion and debate here about the merits or demerits of civil service is therefore wholly immaterial and is about as far from the real effect of the amendment or its purpose as would be the discussion respecting Cuba, at least so far as I am able to understand the English language, unless it be that clerks substituted for postmasters are brought within the purview of the civil-service law, which, in any event, would affect but few persons, and most likely no one.
I understand that the Postmaster-General now has the power to abolish an office. He has the power to enlarge the delivery of any office. He has the power to create stations or substations, and when he creates them he has the power to appoint clerks and other employees to manage the post-office and the stations or substations; and having that power, these people are paid and must be paid out of the appropriation to which this amendment is to be added, so that for this purpose the amendment is surplusage. So, as the amendment originally presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is now modified, it means nothing unless it means by indirection to authorize the Postmaster-General to do what he can not now do by law. I can not see any such concealed purpose, so that nothing is added to the existing authority of the Postmaster-General by the amendment.
I understand in this debate the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] does not complain that the abolition of offices 12 miles from the city of Baltimore and the substitution at those places of substations of the post-office at the city of Baltimore was unlawful, or was not authorized by law; nor do I understand the Senators from Massachusetts to complain because the Postmaster-General has drawn into the Boston post-office an area of 5 or 10 miles, embracing cities of 70,000 population, more or less, because by this consolidation the service is more efficient and more agreeable to the patrons of the post-office.
Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Iowa evidently misunderstood me. I said it was doubtful whether the Postmaster-General had a right to make the extension. The Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], who has examined the law, denies that he has the power at all. But the custom of one hundred years prohibited the construction heretofore.
Mr. PASCO. I think I showed that very conclusively in the argument I made yesterday. The Senator from Wisconsin who addressed the Senate upon the subject this morning nowhere found such authority, if we may judge from the speech which he made to the Senate. He did find some references in recent appropriation acts in classifying clerks for the employment of such clerks at substations, but although he went back to the days of the Revolution and before the Constitution was founded, he has nowhere yet shown any authority for the establishment of a station or a substation beyond the limits of the town or the delivery of the post-office.
Mr. ALLISON. Very well. Now I think the power exists. If it did not exist before, it is to be found in the act of March 2, 1889, by which there is no limit to the area of the delivery of any post-office except that fixed by the Postmaster-General.
Mr. PASCO. Is it in an appropriation act?
Mr. ALLISON. It is in the appropriation act of March 2, 1889, and I have it before me.
Mr. PASCO. That is exactly what I referred to.
Mr. ALLISON. So I want to come back to the question which it is claimed is immediately involved in the amendment. I believe it is a wise thing to establish stations and substations in and about the large cities, at terminal railway points like Chicago or Baltimore, or, if you please, New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, etc.; but I do not believe that it is wise to undertake the consolidation of post-offices in regions more remote from cities or towns where there are not these terminal facilities. Take a city like Baltimore, where the cable cars and the trolley cars run out 4 or 5 miles into suburban villages, as they do in all the great cities of our country, I believe it is convenient to have these stations and substations; but I know of a great number of places where it would be absolutely oppressive to the people to have such stations and substations established. I take my own little city of 40,000 people. It would be convenient to have the people immediately around that city served through the trolley cars or through perhaps a station or two; but to go out beyond 2 or 3 or 4 miles would be a positive injury to those who receive their mails.

The railway cars pass those little stations as they go from or come into the city where I reside, and they have their own post-offices, and they ought to have them. The mails are thrown from the car and picked up by the local postmaster and in a few minutes are ready for distribution to those who know the time of arrival of trains and are waiting to receive their mail, whether letters or newspapers. So if the Postmaster-General is inclined to exercise his authority to gather in the little post-offices, outlying towns, villages, and cities that are not terminal railway stations, that have not the benefit of either cable or trolley cars radiating from their centers, I should be inclined to make a prohibition rather than to enlarge his power in this direction. I should be inclined to adopt the suggestion made by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] that this consolidation should not extend more than 5 miles beyond the city where stations are or may be established. And were it not for the observations made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] that it is the ultimate intent and purpose so to alter and change our present postal system as to draw large areas into a single post-office, with substations and clerks, I should prefer to leave the law as it stands. If it were not for that fear I should have no objection, as I said the other day, to the amendment; but if the amendment is intended in its purpose to authorize the Postmaster-General to draw large areas into a single post-office, I would not be willing to support it unless it has a limitation such as was proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] or the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL].

Believing as I do, however, that the Postmaster-General has full and ample authority now to do whatever ought to be done in this regard, when the opportunity for voting shall come upon the amendment I intend to vote against it. I shall so vote simply in the belief that it will not be beneficial to the administration of the postal service, but be an injury to it. There is no pressure here requiring haste. This matter can be adjusted in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, wisely exercised so as to promote this service, and when necessities come or when abuses appear they can be corrected, and I have no doubt will be. I do not see that either is imminent now.

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa, unless some one desires to speak, why not test the question by a motion to lay the amendment on the table?

Mr. ALLISON. I will make that motion. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves to lay the amendment of the Senator from Colorado on the table.

Mr. WOLCOTT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask to have the amendment on which we are about to vote reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

Provided, That whenever, by order of the Postmaster-General, any post-office is consolidated with any office so as to become a station or substation of the same, the salary of the superintendent or clerk in charge of such station or substation may then be paid out of the appropriation.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALTHALL (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired on this question with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY].

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. I do not see him in the Chamber, and in his absence I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should, vote "yea."

Mr. HAWLEY (when Mr. PLATT'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PLATT] is not quite well enough to come to the Chamber. I have tried in vain to pair him. If he were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SEWELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL]. I do not see him in the Chamber. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understood the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] to announce a pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. I suggest that he transfer his pair to my colleague [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PRITCHARD. At the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. I vote "yea."

Mr. FAULKNER. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who, I think, has not voted. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. ALLEN (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted a moment ago, not recalling the fact that I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] on this bill. I will transfer my pair to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], so that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania and the junior Senator from South Dakota will stand paired, and I will let my vote stand.

Mr. THURSTON. I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 48, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—48.

Allen,	Chilton,	Hawley,	Proctor,

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. PASCO. I now offer the amendment of which I gave notice yesterday evening.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Page 2, line 6, after the word "seat," insert the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the establishment or maintenance of any station, substation, or branch post-office beyond the limits of any city or town in which the principal office, to which such station, substation, or branch office is attached, is located.

Mr. HILL. I now offer an amendment, in line 2, after the words "shall authorize," to insert the words "or permit," and after the word "beyond," in line 3, to insert the words "5 miles outside of." I do not care about repeating what I said yesterday. I think there should be a little leeway, and it should not be absolutely confined to the boundaries of the cities and large towns. While 5 miles is an arbitrary limit, it will be found, I think, to be practically sufficient to answer all purposes. I hope the Senator from Florida will accept the amendment.

Mr. PASCO. I prefer to test the sense of the Senate upon the amendment as I offered it. If it is voted down, then the Senator from New York can offer his amendment subsequently.

Mr. HILL. I will offer mine, then, first. Mine will have to be voted on first, I suppose.

Mr. PASCO. Very well, then, let it be submitted in that way, if the Senator offers it as an amendment to my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from New York to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "authorize," in line 2, insert the words "or permit," and after the word "beyond" insert the words "5 miles outside of"; so as to read:

That nothing herein contained shall authorize or permit the establishment or maintenance of any station, substation, or branch post-office beyond 5 miles outside of the limits of any city or town.

Mr. HALE. I do not know that I fully understand what is to be the scope and effect of this amendment, but I can give an illustration where, if its operation would be as I believe, I think it would strike almost every Senator here that it should be voted down. Take the State of Maine, where the principal office in the region about the city of Portland is at that place, which is a city of perhaps 40,000 people. Within 5 miles of Portland there are eight or ten important towns, ranging from 1,200 to 6,000 people each. Three of them are minor cities, and the people of the town of Yarmouth, the city of Deering, the city of Westbrook, the city of Cape Elizabeth, and the other towns in that circuit of 5 miles have just as great pride in having a good post-office of their own and having a citizen of their own town as postmaster as the city of Portland. It would create not only dissatisfaction, and deserved dissatisfaction, but great irritation and discontent if we should undertake to interfere with the service there. For that reason alone, applying as it does in my own mind to this case at home, and believing and knowing that it would apply to hundreds of similar cases, I shall certainly very gladly vote against the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, that brings to my mind the fact that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], in describing some of the suburban post-offices in the vicinity of New Haven, said the income or compensation in one case was only $352. I do not know whether any of the small offices there are of that character.

Mr. HALE. The compensation of some of the smaller post-offices outside of the principal cities ranges from $1,500 to $2,000 a year. The offices are held by the first citizens of the cities, by men who have been mayors, who have been members of the legislature, who are men of character and standing and represent their entire community. No central office can send out to them a clerk or a subordinate or an understrapper who will satisty those people. They are entitled to an officer of their own; they have had it for years and ought to have it, and it would be an invasion of their rights if an attempt should be made to take it away from them.

Mr. HAWLEY. I want to call attention to another objection, as it seems to me, that in the case of small offices, spoken of by the Senator, one of which I recollect, if a civil-service clerk should be sent there he would probably be a clerk at $1,000 or $1,200 a year. I do not see the economy in such a case in changing the heads of these small offices. When such an office is taken by a citizen living in the community, who is engaged in some other business there, he is satisfied with a small compensation, but a civil-service clerk would not be.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator from Maine if I understand that he is opposed to my particular amendment, which relates to the 5-mile limit, or is he opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], which absolutely prohibits an appointment outside of the corporate limits?

Mr. HALE. I was discussing the question before the Senate, which is the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], known as the 5-mile-limit amendment. That, for the reasons I have given, I am very strongly and determinedly opposed to. If that amendment should be voted down, when the proposition of the Senator from Florida comes up it will be dealt with by itself; it will be stripped of the 5-mile-limit provision and stand itself upon a different proposition from that of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. The situation, then, is simply this: As it has been explained here by the Senator from Colorado, there is nothing now to prevent the Postmaster-General, except the question of money, from placing an agent or a clerk in charge of every post-office which the Senator names. The Postmaster-General can do that to-day, provided he has sufficient money. Then comes the amendment. If the Senator desires to prevent that absolutely, of course he must support the amendment of the Senator from Florida. Thinking that that amendment was a little too strict, a little too severe, that it would cut off the discretion which the Postmaster-General should have in reference to localities within a small distance from large towns, I thought it wise to offer the amendment I have submitted. It may, of course, operate harshly upon the particular city which the Senator has in mind; but if nothing whatever is done, the power already exists to-day, under present conditions, provided the Postmaster-General has sufficient money at his disposal.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, I think there is just the point in the case—the last sentence uttered by the Senator—"under present conditions," and particularly if this amendment should be voted down, no Postmaster-General will depart from the unvarying usage heretofore and undertake to abolish the offices I have indicated. I have no fear of that. Granted that he has the power, he will not exercise it, especially if the amendment is voted down.

Mr. HILL. The Senator will permit me to make another suggestion, which is, if he has no idea that the Postmaster-General will exercise that power now, my amendment does not give him any greater power. My amendment simply prevents his going beyond that; that is all.

Mr. HALE. Yes; but the trouble would be that if we incorporate into this measure a provision giving him a discretion and assenting to that discretion on his part, he will exercise what he never has before, and it will arm him with a moral strength, if you call it that, which he has not now, and he will venture to depart from all that his predecessors have done.

Mr. HILL. By simply saying that the Postmaster-General shall not make a substation outside of the 5-mile limit, we give him no greater power than he now has inside of the 5-mile limit.

Mr. HALE. The Senator knows, as a good lawyer, the tremendous power of expressio unius et exclusio alterius.

Mr. HILL. It has no application here.

Mr. HALE. It has precisely that application. If you provide that the Postmaster-General shall not do that outside of the 5-mile limit, the Postmaster-General would have warrant to determine and declare that it was meant by that that he might do it inside of the 5-mile limit. That is the expression.

Mr. HILL. That is the very power he has to-day.

Mr. HALE. But he will not exercise it unless you give him this additional power.

Mr. HILL. Then this legislation will give him no such power, and if he is reluctant to exercise it to-day, it strikes me, after this discussion, he will not be very eager to exercise the power hereafter.

I advocate the 5-mile limit, because I think it would cut off the power to consolidate with large cities small offices within 5 miles. I think the whole discussion has shown that the Senate is in favor of a reasonable exercise of this power within a short distance of the large towns and villages, and there it ought to stop.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator, with the conditions I have described in the State of Maine, the large towns, which are cities themselves, having always had their own postmasters, their own offices, having a natural jealousy against the larger cities, does he think that any Postmaster-General ought to be authorized in terms to obliterate these offices and make them appanages of the larger cities?

Mr. HILL. I would suppose the Postmaster-General would say that what has worked so well in the past will undoubtedly work well in the future; and yet we find the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] absolutely urging this provision as applicable to the cities adjoining Boston.

I think that we may trust the Postmaster-General to this limited extent, at least. I think he will not be disposed to exercise this power, which he has not heretofore exercised, when we substantially say to him, by the adoption either of my amendment or that of the Senator from Florida, that we think the system of combining post-offices should not be extended beyond the 5-mile limit; and it does not necessarily follow that he will take that as an instruction that he should go to the extent of changing the postmaster in an adjoining city within 3 miles. I do not think he would. I do not think there is any danger to be apprehended by it, and I think this reasonable leeway ought to be given. The Senator from Maine can well trust the present Postmaster-General, or any other Postmaster-General who may succeed him, to that reasonable limit.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I do not think that the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] ought to pass. I favor the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], to give a line of demarcation, distinct and clearly understood, and likewise a limit to the power of the Postmaster-General to appoint these clerks. To extend the right to consolidate these offices to some arbitrary distance greatly enlarges that power. I am against the extension of any of the powers of the Postmaster-General, which I am sorry to see have been exercised even so far. I think we should fix a limit to his jurisdiction in this matter. The expression of one thing would be the exclusion of another. If Congress should say that it favored this policy within the corporate limits of a city or town, it would be an expression equivalent to saying it was opposed to it outside of the corporate limits. I do not wish to see the principle extended so far. I think it is a centralizing step and moves in the direction of consolidation, and as such my opposition to it is fundamental. In addition to that, I think it would not work practically. Therefore I shall oppose the amendment of the Senator from New York because it proposes to go beyond the corporate limits, and shall, so far as my vote will go, sustain the proposition of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I think in metropolitan districts like New York, Philadelphia, Boston, etc., the postal business ought to be controlled by one postmaster. In my State we have three or four comparatively large cities, which have from two to ten post-offices within the 5-mile limit—country offices with postmasters appointed by general consent of the community. They are offices generally run by young women and members of their families in a way which is perfectly satisfactory to the respective communities, and I should decidedly object to having the offices absorbed in this manner. I would go further and say to the Senator from New York that I see no reason why Jersey City and Hoboken, under his amendment, should not be made substations, as they are within the 5-mile limit.

Mr. HALE. Substations to New York?

Mr. SEWELL. Substations to New York.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call attention to the fact that as the amendment has been read, there is a mistake as to the point where it should come in. It should come at the end of the amendment accepted by the Senator from Massachusetts—the amendment wherein Cambridge was excepted—instead of coming in at the end of line 6.

Mr. ALLEN. Let the amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 6, after the word "seat," it is proposed to insert:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the establishment or maintenance of any station, substation, or branch post-office beyond the limits of any city or town in which the principal office, to which such station, substation, or branch office is attached, is located.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida if he has any objection to inserting the word "corporate" before "limits"?

Mr. PASCO. I have, because a great many towns are not incorporated. We have towns all over our Southern country which are not incorporated.

Mr. ALLEN. Are there any cities or towns of sufficient size requiring a central office and the establishment of substations that are not incorporated?

Mr. PASCO. I do not know how far this extension may be carried.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest to the Senator that if we simply say, "the limits of any city or town," it means nothing.

Mr. PASCO. The "city of Washington" certainly means something; the "city of Alexandria" certainly means something, and "Monticello," where I live, is measured by certain metes and bounds, and certainly means something. I think it would be intelligible the whole country over.

Mr. ALLEN. I am in accord with the Senator from Florida; I am not antagonizing him at all; but I had prepared and printed an amendment in this language, to be inserted on page 2, after line 6:

Provided further, That no subpost-office or station shall be established outside of or beyond the corporate limits of the town or city in which the principal office is established; nor shall a postmaster or clerk of any subpost-office or station be appointed to administer the affairs thereof who is not at the time of his appointment a bona fide resident and elector of the community in which said subpost-office or station is located.

I submit that to say "outside of or beyond the limits of Washington" is not equivalent to saying "beyond the corporate limits of Washington."

Mr. PASCO. If the Senator will permit me, a suggestion has been made to me by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] which perhaps may enable us to agree. That is, to have the amendment state "beyond the corporate limits or boundaries."

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

Mr. PASCO. I am willing to use that language, if it will satisfy the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. That is agreeable.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the practical effect of this amendment, which I do not think can be quite realized, even by the Senator from Florida, who has proposed it. The other day, when the exception was inserted in regard to the county seats, I asked to have the city of Cambridge excluded from that, because it was now included in a metropolitan district, and, as I understood, preferred the metropolitan service. The Senate assented to that proposition very kindly and Cambridge was excepted. Under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida, Cambridge is thrown out of the metropolitan circuit at once. Not only that, but Chelsea and Somerville, cities of fifty and sixty thousand inhabitants, which are practically part of Boston for the purposes of the postal service, are forced out of the metropolitan system, under which they now exist and under which they have been for years. The effect of the amendment will be practically to break up every metropolitan district in the country and require its entire reorganization.

Mr. GRAY. Disfranchise them.

Mr. LODGE. It will force them out of the system which they now prefer and have had for years into systems which have been abandoned as inferior. I think that it is very unfair to those established systems to force them out by an arbitrary amendment of this character about corporate limits. It seems to me that this is going a great deal too far in arranging for the postal service of large cities.

The rights of the fourth-class postmasters and the village stores have been protected, and I think the unfortunate inhabitants of large cities are entitled to some rights. I think they are entitled to have the service they prefer, and the best service, and this amendment will force them out of the metropolitan districts in which they are now.

I am inclined to think that within the metropolitan district of New York there are some important stations which will be thrown out by the amendment of the Senator from Florida. I am not sure about that, but that is my impression. It will be certainly so in many cities. It would be a very serious matter in the city of Boston; and I trust the amendment as it stands will not be adopted.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, it strikes me that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has given us the very best reason and argument in the world why this amendment should be carried. The fact that this consolidation, this extension, has taken place without any statutory foundation, and has been carried to this extent simply on departmental construction and legislation, is a strong reason why we should arrest this action and limit and stop it, and prevent it from going any further.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question, if he will pardon me.

Mr. PASCO. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I will not say anything about the general rule; but does he desire that the city of Cambridge, which is as old a political organization as the city of Boston, shall, against the experience of now ten or twelve years—I do not now know how long; my colleague can tell me—and the desire of its citizens and the protest of the two Senators from Massachusetts, who represent it, be forced back into the old system; or, if he will not accept the statement of my colleague, that it desires to remain under the system which is now so satisfactory in its operation?

Mr. PASCO. Whenever this subject comes up for consideration upon some proposition to legislate directly upon it all these questions can be considered; but the argument which was made to the Senate yesterday demonstrated that there is no foundation in law for these extensions of postal districts so as to absorb post-offices in neighboring towns and cities. Personally, I should be opposed to reducing Cambridge, in which I have a great deal of pride, to the position of a mere substation. It is a noble, grand old city, and I do not like to consider it merely as a substation of Boston; but I do not wish or expect my own views to control in a matter in which the people of Cambridge are concerned. It is really for the people of Massachusetts and the people of Boston and of Cambridge——

Mr. HOAR. One word.

Mr. PASCO. The Senator will please let me finish my sentence. It is a matter for those who are interested in the postal business of Cambridge to determine for themselves. If in the future they wish to have local legislation of this character, I shall be perfectly willing to assist the Senators from Massachusetts in carrying it out, but I think it is time now that the existing law should be settled and enforced, controlling and determining and settling this question, so that we may prevent from this time forth the continuance of this system of stations and substations beyond the limits of the principal office, which, as I said before, has, in my opinion, no foundation in law.

Mr. HOAR. What I wanted to say to the Senator was that the people of Cambridge are satisfied with the present situation whereby Cambridge is allowed to have the advantages of prompt, convenient, and frequent postal service and to share in those advantages with the great city in its neighborhood. You might as well say, instead of giving Cambridge a part of the great Boston aqueduct system which is about to be established at a cost of a million dollars, we should insist on Cambridge having a little pond of her own from which to draw her water supply.

Mr. PASCO. Whenever there is such a proposition to extend these facilities to Cambridge as has been indicated by the two Senators from Massachusetts, I shall cooperate with them and give my vote in favor of it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I should be very sorry to have broken up a relation so natural as that which prevails between Cambridge and Boston. Cambridge has long enjoyed these postal accommodations. The spirit of the amendment of the Senator from Florida does not aim at that, in my judgment. There is no objection, I think, to the consolidation with large cities of small places in contiguous territory. Cambridge lies right by the side of Boston, adjoining it, with only an imaginary line dividing them. Boston and Cambridge are practically one city.

What has been said in the Senate during the discussion of the past two or three days, in explanation of this system of branch post-offices and in relation to offices in places which constitute one city practically, illustrates what was said by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] the other day, that we are patching away and attempting a very great change, whereas if there is anything to be done in the way of reorganizing the post-office service it should be taken up in a separate bill, fairly considered in all its details, and be laid before the public for some time, so that we may get general sentiment about it, and not have it passed as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon this amendment, I wish to suggest to Senators that there is another matter connected with the subject which we are now discussing which has not yet been brought to our attention. Kansas City, in the State of Missouri, is on one side of the State line between Missouri and Kansas, and immediately across the line is Kansas City, in Kansas. The two cities are now lying so closely together that the buildings are commingled one with the other, and a stranger passing through would not know where one city ends and the other begins. Under the postal system there is no such thing as State lines; at least at present. Unless there be some restriction, either in the amendment of the Senator from Florida or in another amendment, Kansas City, Kans., being the smaller of the two, would very naturally and logically, under the present régime, be consolidated with Kansas City, Mo., and that would take the breath out of our people: it would make them heartsick, and I I should not blame them for it, for it has become a beautiful city, with some forty or fifty thousand people, and to be absorbed by the mother city on the other side of the river would be a very serious thing with them, indeed. We are expecting to have public buildings there—a custom-house, a post-office, and other Government buildings—in a little while to show to visitors when they come, and we do not want to be absorbed by any other city. If there is to be an absorption, we had rather be the absorbers ourselves.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I concur fully in the sentiments uttered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. This is not the proper place to consider this question. It is one which involves a great many details; one which involves the peculiar interests of the people in the different localities to which it may be applied, the needs of which should be ascertained fully by the Post-Office Department before this rule of consolidation is applied to those communities.

The discussion that has taken place in the Senate here fully illustrates the views and sentiments of this body as to the extent of this consolidation. I think we may let the matter stand without fear of any bad effect upon the postal service or upon the interests and conveniences of the communities to be affected by the action of the Postmaster-General, who is entirely in the control of this subject.

I believe further, sir, that if this provision should be now adopted it would only be a temporary law. This is simply an appropriation bill; it only proposes to make appropriations for one year; and this law would not affect in any way the action of the Post-Office Department after the termination of the year for which the appropriations are made.

It strikes me, therefore, that the best thing the Senate can do in matters of this kind, after having expressed so decidedly their sentiment as to the extent of the consolidation of these offices, is to vote down this amendment, and trust the Postmaster-General to carry out the views of members of the Senate and of the Senate itself as they have been expressed on the floor, and the views of Congress, I may say, as to the system of consolidation which has been adopted by the Post-Office Department. I think it rather unwise, Mr. President, to bring this matter here on an appropriation bill for the purpose of limiting and controlling a power which has existed always in the hands of the Post-Office Department, and has never, except in one instance, so far as I know, brought any animadversion upon the office in the execution of that power.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the point suggested by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] had occurred to me, and it was because of that fact that I suggested yesterday that the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] be withheld until the disposition of this motion. It is absolutely true that at the expiration of the next fiscal year the Postmaster-General can do as he pleases in regard to this very proposition. There is no doubt about that. This bill simply proposes to make appropriations for the expenditure of moneys for the next fiscal year, "that nothing herein contained shall authorize" so and so. That is all there is of it. There is nothing here authorized. It is an appropriation of money. The Senator from Florida, however, and the Senate might as well dispose of this question now, and dispose of it as it has a mind to. While I think the 5-mile limit should have been added, nevertheless, if it is desired hereafter to prevent the erection of these post-offices outside of the corporate limits of cities or towns, let us say so, and let us place it in the bill.

I suggest to the Senator from Florida that instead of saying:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall authorize—

He should strike out all the words down to and including the word "post-office," in line 3, and let the amendment read:

That hereafter no station, substation, or branch office shall be established beyond the limits of any city or town, etc.

That perfects it. That is what the Senate wants to do, I think, from the disposition which has been manifested; it wants to limit it to the cities, and does not want it to go outside. If you attempt to do anything at all, it must be put in that language; and it will not affect anything except for the next fiscal year.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator repeat the language?

Mr. PASCO. I will accede to the wish of the Senator from New York and accept the modification.

Mr. HILL. I suggest that we strike out all down to the word "post-office," in line 3, and insert:

That hereafter no station, substation, or branch post-office shall be established—

Then comes the rest of the amendment—beyond the corporate limits or boundaries of any city or town in which the principal office to which such station, substation, or branch office is attached is located.

That does not interfere with those already appointed.

Mr. PASCO. "Be established or maintained" are the words of the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from New York to the amendment will be stated.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator from Florida accept the amendment?

Mr. GORMAN. "Hereafter maintained or established."

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Maryland suggests the words "hereafter maintained or established." I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. PASCO. The Senator from New York does not propose to strike out the word "maintained"?

Mr. GORMAN. The Postmaster-General has already established, according to the report, a hundred stations outside of city limits.

Mr. HILL. I accept the suggestion. Let it be "established or maintained."

Mr. ALLISON. The effect of that would be——

Mr. LODGE. To destroy all existing stations outside of city limits.

Mr. ALLISON. To destroy all stations outside of city limits, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to make a suggestion in order to see how the amendment will affect a situation in my State. On the State line between Arkansas and the State of Texas there is a town of three or four thousand people on the Arkansas side and of six or seven thousand on the Texas side, each being a distinct and separate corporation. The Government has a public building on the line, with a single postmaster serving both of those towns. Now, if I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida as proposed to be amended, it will be absolutely necessary to have two postmasters in what is really one town.

Mr. PASCO. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. That is entirely true.

Mr. PASCO. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. So would Kansas City.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There are two corporations. The limitation of the amendment is that there shall be no station——

Mr. PASCO. Or subdivision. That is not a station. It is a post-office.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. But it may not include two corporations.

Mr. PASCO. Certainly, three if you like.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I see no reason why they could not include the number of towns mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PASCO. It would prevent the establishment of a substation in one State or city and another substation in another, both incorporated in one post-office. That would be the effect of it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is all right.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it the intention of the Senator from New York to prevent the maintenance of any post-office outside of the city limits during the present fiscal year or only to prevent the maintenance of or establishment of such stations hereafter? The language first proposed by him would cover all these cases.

Mr. HILL. That was my idea.

Mr. ALLISON. But it will not cover any case of consolidation hitherto——

Mr. HILL. I accepted the suggestion that it should read that no substation or branch post-office shall be established or maintained.

Mr. ALLISON. That of course will necessitate a change as respects the illustration of the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. HILL. I have no objection——

Mr. ALLISON. And I do not know how many others.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator from Iowa whether it would cover the hundred stations already established?

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps it would. I submit that we are rather legislating in the dark in this respect. I am of the opinion expressed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] that no Postmaster-General after reading or even casually observing the debate we have had here to-day is likely to extend these sub-offices beyond the city limits.

Mr. HALE. Where they are not already established.

Mr. ALLISON. Where they are not already established, and I think he will be inclined to retrace his steps in the instances already mentioned here as to Ellicott City and others. So I believe that for this year we might trust the Postmaster-General not to make radical change as to those post-offices. Although I do not belong to the same political organization with the Postmaster-General, I would be willing, in the face of what has occurred and what is likely to occur, to trust him as to the consolidation of post-offices.

Now, here is the case illustrated by the Senator from Massachusetts, where the people desire such consolidation.

Mr. HAWLEY. It has been in effect a long time.

Mr. ALLISON. It has been in effect for a long time. In the case suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] a Postmaster-General would be guilty of little short of madness who would consolidate three or four towns competing with each other for supremacy. So I think we can trust the Postmaster-General.

I regret that we have had occasion to have this debate. I regret that we have had it intimated here that there is a disposition to abolish half the post-offices in the United States and to consolidate them with the offices in towns and cities. I do not believe that is the purpose of the Postmaster-General, but if it is he ought to be admonished and warned by the debate in this Chamber for the last two or three days that it does not meet with public approval, at least so far as the Senate of the United States is concerned.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the Senate is interested in knowing what offices are affected, the Senators have the information on their desks in the form of a letter of the Postmaster-General, in which he states the independent offices which have been consolidated during the last two years. They are about 100 in number, and are given there. There are 56 in Chicago, and there are several in Baltimore. Then there are a number of others. The New Grand Rapids (Mich.) office is consolidated with the Grand Rapids office, as is Oakdale Park, Mich. The Mispah (Tenn.), Elcan (Tenn.), and Estellville (Tenn.) offices are consolidated with the Memphis office. Parkville, N. Y., is consolidated with Brooklyn. West Cleveland, Ohio, is consolidated with Cleveland. Lakeview, Mass., is consolidated with Worcester. Greendale, Mass., is consolidated with Worcester. Chancy, Iowa, is consolidated with Clinton, Iowa. Tennallytown out here is consolidated with Washington. A great outrage has been committed by consolidating Tennallytown with Washington.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Colorado pardon me? The two offices which were consolidated with the Worcester office are both within the city limits.

Mr. WOLCOTT. They are mentioned as having been independent offices.

Mr. HOAR. They were, but they are both inside the city limits.

Mr. WOLCOTT. They are stated as having been independent offices. The others are given here, and if Senators are interested they will find them in the report which accompanies the amendment.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I merely wish to make one more statement in this matter as to why I think there is no fear in reference to the action of the Postmaster-General outside of my reliance and confidence in his judgment. Having voted down the amendment submitted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], which proposed to transfer the salary of the postmaster where the office was abolished and designated as a substation and enable it to be used for clerical purposes, the Postmaster-General is left with no funds to use for the establishment of such stations and the employment of clerical assistants in order to carry out the consolidation except the appropriation for clerical purposes found in the pending appropriation bill. That amount is not increased very largely as compared with last year, when but few consolidations took place.

Therefore it will be utterly impossible for the Postmaster-General to consolidate many offices. He will apply the consolidations only to cities and those immediate suburbs which demand the facilities incident to the establishment of this system. So I think there need be no fear on the part of the Senate as to the result.

Mr. GORMAN. I should be delighted if I could believe with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] that without such a provision as is proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] these consolidations would not go on. Here stands the fact before us that the Postmaster-General in an official communication has stated that he has taken a hundred of those offices and consolidated them, as the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] thinks, without law, certainly in opposition to custom. He further advises us that he proposes to continue the consolidation, and he states the very extreme case that he would like to take in all the offices on Long Island which has been discussed here.

Now, the officials come before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate and say, as the chairman of the committee has already stated to the Senate, that to do that they can use only the appropriation for clerks. The House of Representatives, after full discussion of the Post-Office appropriation bill—and I have no doubt, from the intimation in the debate, that it was done for the purpose of limiting the power of the Postmaster-General—itemized the bill and made specific appropriations for postmasters and clerks, in the amount to be expended for the purchase of horses and wagons and bicycles, etc. But it was stated to us on this side of the Capitol that it would limit the power of the Postmaster-General, and therefore the Department would like to have more money. The Senate, instead of the $10,350,000, has already voted $10,500,000 for clerk hire. With that appropriation in the bill as we have passed it the Postmaster-General can go on and not only maintain the hundred offices or sub-stations where he has abolished post-offices, but he can increase the system.

If there were the slightest intimation on the part of anyone who is authorized to speak that the consolidation of country post-offices would not continue, I myself would not be inclined to put such a provision on this bill. The pending bill is different from any other appropriation bill. No such power is given to any officer of the Government as is given in this bill to the Postmaster-General, with a lump sum to do as he pleases. For instance, he can divide it up with the railroads of the country for transportation; but with the extension of all these little roads, with the extension of the postal service, it has been considered necessary, and I do not know that it has ever been abused. It is true the amounts are piling up and up and up, but it is a service which the people demand, and the greatest possible discretion must be placed in the hands of the Postmaster-General and his assistants, and the highest integrity is wanted in that office. I have no doubt it is there. It has always been there.

There may be extravagance; I think possibly there is; but the Senate by its amendment has eliminated all the restrictions placed in the bill by the other House, and we have given him the same power that all other Postmasters-General have had. And it has come to this one thing. He is the first Postmaster-General who has attempted to inaugurate a system of this sort. Others have suggested it, and when they found that Congress refused to give the power they never presumed to exercise it.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland a question, if he will allow me. I had not heard the whole debate. Does not this come almost wholly from the delivery system? Before the delivery system was inaugurated, when the people had to go to the post-offices to get their letters, they wanted a great many post-offices, even within the limits of the same city. Almost every town in my own State, and I suppose it was so in the rest of the country, would have several independent post-offices in it. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] has mentioned two offices in my own city, Worcester, which were abolished and put under the general post-office, for the reason that the postmaster of Worcester has extended his delivery system to those communities, and the people—the established families and business men—do not go to the post-office once in three months.

Mr. GORMAN. In the cities that is true, as the Senator from Massachusetts states. I this morning received a letter from a gentleman in one of those offices which has been consolidated, a little town outside of Baltimore, 5½ miles from the central post-office in Baltimore. It is one of those villages that has grown up on the old national road which led to the West, constructed in the early days. There they had a separate post-office—a Presidential office—which paid a salary of $1,200 a year. This gentleman, who is a resident there and has no personal interest in the office, says that they abolished that office and made a substation of it, and with it they abolished the postmaster (who he was I do not know) and sent out from the city of Baltimore a clerk to take charge of it. The office under the old postmaster, which gave under all Administrations perfect satisfaction to the community, cost, with the salary of the postmaster, $2,000 per annum. They then sent out a clerk at $800 and two letter carriers at $1,000 each. So far are the people removed from the central office that the mail which arrives early in the morning gets around by the carriers at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, because of the immense territory to be covered.

Now, it is the making of such an arrangement in a purely country district—in an agricultural district—that I object to, and not as to towns and cities. Let them have their service, whether the service is to be increased, as it has been increased in the last two or three years, by deliveries not only twice a day, but five or six times a day, until the appropriation in six years has run up from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000. Where the limit is to be is another matter which I do not care to discuss now. But I should like to have it confined to incorporated cities, and not extended to agricultural districts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

Mr. GORMAN. On that let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURROWS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY].

Mr. CARTER. I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and vote "nay."

Mr. THURSTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ALLEN (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire again to announce my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] and let my vote stand.

Mr. CARTER. I understand that my pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] has been otherwise arranged, and I desire to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL. I desire to announce on this question the pair of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY]. I ask that this announcement may apply to any other yea-and-nay vote that may occur during the day.

Mr. TURPIE. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer my pair to my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MARTIN. I am paired with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE]. I desire to transfer my pair to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—36.

Allen,	Carter,	Hill,	Proctor,

Davis,	Kyle,	Quay,	Warren.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask at this time unanimous consent to strike out, on page 9, line 23, all after the word "dollars" down to and including the end of the paragraph. I omitted to say when the paragraph was reached that a different disposition has been made of this expenditure. The deficiency bill passed recently provides that this expense shall be paid from the appropriations made for the Department of Justice. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the proviso may be stricken out down to and including the words "United States" in line 6, on page 10.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, after the word "dollars" in line 23, it is proposed to strike out the proviso, as follows:

Provided, That not exceeding $5,000 of this amount may be expended for fees to United States attorneys, marshals, clerks of courts, and special counsel necessarily employed in prosecuting civil suits instituted by the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, through the Solicitor of the Treasury, against the sureties on the official bonds of late postmasters, as provided for by section 292, Revised Statutes of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg to call up the amendment which I sent to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment already adopted, following line 2, on page 4, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That $50,000 of this amount be used to defray the expense of experiments in rural free delivery, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, and the amount heretofore appropriated for this purpose and still unexpended be available for said experiments.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, there has been money appropriated for this purpose before. The Postmaster-General, in his report for 1893, says that he has not used the money appropriated. He says:

In the appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, Congress provided $10,000 to be used, at the discretion of the Postmaster-General, in testing the feasibility of establishing a system of free delivery in rural districts.

I should like to have the Secretary read the paragraph which I have marked.

Mr. VILAS. I desire to make, at some time before 5 o'clock, a motion and perhaps move an amendment. With the permission of the Senator from North Carolina, I will make the motion now, so as to have it pending. It is to strike out the clause from line 11 to the words "postal service," in line 18, on page 6. It is simply to strike out the appropriation for necessary and special facilities, as it is called, on the route from New York to New Orleans. Three years in succession the Postmaster-General has recommended that that be omitted from the bill and he declined to estimate for it. We do not get by two hours as fast service on the mail train for which we pay $143,000 as is given to passengers on a passenger train upon the same route.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator stated yesterday that he would offer another amendment.

Mr. VILAS. I stated that if the clause is not stricken out, if my first proposition is not agreed to, I shall move to limit the appropriation for necessary and special facilities to $175,000.

Mr. BUTLER. While the Senator from Wisconsin is referring to that subject, I will state that I hold in my hand the report of the Postmaster-General for 1895, in which report he says:

In submitting the estimates for the fiscal years 1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896, this office declined to include the item of "special facilities," for reasons heretofore stated.

The Postmaster-General goes on to say that he thinks it demoralizes the service and that it is a wrong to the railroads who do not get the special facilities. He says it is an extra bonus to the roads given these special facilities; that they get so much more than other routes and it does not add anything to the service. I heartily concur in the Senator's motion.

Mr. VILAS. I did not mean to interfere in any way with the Senator from North Carolina, who is entitled to the floor and perhaps intends to speak.

Mr. BUTLER. I have an amendment relating to rural free delivery which I want to have acted on. I ask the Secretary to read the paragraph which I have marked in the report of the Postmaster-General for 1893, page 55.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

RURAL FREE DELIVERY.

In the appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, Congress provided $10,000 to be used, at the discretion of the Postmaster-General, in testing the feasibility of establishing a system of free delivery in rural districts.

It has been impossible, up to this time, to give the subject of rural free delivery the study and consideration that it necessarily requires, much less to put it into actual operation. This is due, in the first place, to the fact that the time and energy of the free-delivery division has been, and is now, entirely taken up with the problem of properly maintaining, with a deficient appropriation, the free-delivery service in the cities in which it is now established, and in declining the requests for and deferring the establishment of the free-delivery service in the 93 towns that are entitled to it under the law enacted January 3, 1887. Secondly, the amount of the appropriation for this particular experiment is not at all sufficient to provide thorough and reliable tests. The conditions in different sections vary so, that a test made in and favorable to one particular locality would prove unsatisfactory if attempted in any other. For instance, a plan that might be efficient in a thickly settled rural district in New England, with its good pikes and stone roads, would not be at all practicable in certain parts of Ohio, in which the farmers are scattered and the roads during certain seasons of the year practically impassable.

Another illustration can be found in a comparison between the States of New York and Mississippi. A free-delivery system that would prove satisfactory to the residents of a fruit-raising and gardening district of New York State, requiring quick and frequent communication with the markets, would have to be operated on very different lines from a system that would meet the requirements of a plantation section of Mississippi, where the population is scattered.

Mr. BUTLER. Inasmuch as the time is growing short and some other Senators wish to speak, I will not have the whole paragraph read. The Secretary will stop. I wish to call attention, however, to the last report of the Postmaster-General, the report for 1895, in which he says:

The amount appropriated by Congress ($20,000) to test the feasibility of establishing rural free delivery was not expended during the last fiscal year, the Department not being able to devise a plan by which a satisfactory test could be made with this small allowance.

Both these reports show that the Postmaster-General has not used the amount because it is too small, and that has been his chief reason. He names some other reasons. I find here in a report from Postmaster-General Wanamaker the following statement:

I think it quite possible to spread the free delivery over entire counties. For example, in Pennsylvania—

He takes different counties in Pennsylvania and Massachusetts and shows how the free-delivery experiment, practically and with great advantage to people, can be carried over those counties.

My amendment provides for an appropriation of $50,000. I had in the original amendment the amount fixed at $100,000, but at the suggestion of a member of the Committee on Appropriations I cut it down to $50,000. The amendment also provides that the $20,000, which has been already appropriated and has not been used, shall be available for this experiment. This amount will enable the Postmaster-General to make experiments in probably two or three counties—to make one in a thickly settled section and one in a sparsely settled section.

The scheme is practicable, because there are a number of countries doing it to-day. It has been done by the people in a number of localities on their own arrangement. The people to-day in a number of neighborhoods arrange to have a free-delivery system and to pay for it themselves. But the main point is that the Government appropriates money for special delivery in cities where men live within ten minutes' and five minutes' and two minutes' walk of the post-office, where it would not take ten minutes of a man's time to go and get his mail; but the man who has not these facilities, though he is taxed to support the Government, is the man who has to take his horse from the plow and ride 5 miles or 3 miles to get his papers or his letters. It would be better for the farmer to be taxed a special tax to pay for this free delivery than for the 35,000,000 farmers of this country to have to stop their work in a busy season and go to their post-offices for their mails.

The Postmaster-General says it will take $20,000,000 to do this. Now, that is guesswork to some extent. This amendment does not propose to appropriate $20,000,000; it does not provide that the Postmaster-General shall establish a free-delivery system all over the country, but it appropriates a small amount for him to make a fair test. The people of this country are entitled to a fair test to know whether the system can be operated economically, practically, and satisfactorily to the people and to the Government. Every objection that the Postmaster-General has made heretofore will be removed by giving $50,000, with the $20,000 unexpended. There can be no objection to it. It is certainly a small amount to make a test of a very important matter.

Mr. PERKINS. As it is understood that at 5 o'clock we shall commence to vote upon the amendments without debate, I desire to say a very few words in answer to the charges made by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] in relation to the proposed amendment by the committee, on page 7, from line 9 to line 20, for increased compensation for the transportation of the ocean mails between San Francisco and the Australian colonies. If time would permit I think I could satisfy my friend that he is mistaken in several of the assertions he made, one in particular, as to the refusal of the owners of the vessels at the time they were under construction to come within the provisions of the act of 1891.

Another point that he stated is that there is no danger whatever that this line of American steamships, the only line plying on the Pacific Ocean south of the equator, being withdrawn by reason of the competition of the line of British steamers so heavily subsidized between Vancouver and Australia. He read at the time from what was undoubtedly the report of the postmaster-general of New Zealand wherein he stated that they had entered into a contract for the purpose of carrying the mail for a particular compensation for a term of years. I find by referring to his remarks that the Government only authorized the making of a contract for transporting the mails, and that the compensation was at the rate of 11 shillings per pound net for the letters. Therefore it implies that whatever the compensation might be it was subject to the amount of mail that they carried.

Another claim the Senator made is that our Government is paying this steamship company a liberal compensation for the transportation of the mails. I do not know upon what line of analogy he reasons. Is it because the Canadian Government and the English Government are paying the Canadian line of steamers $18,000 per trip as against our Government paying $4,400 per trip, as it did last year? Or is it by reason of the distance, which in round figures is, say, 7,000 miles by the route these steamers usually travel? If that is the argument, surely the expense of a voyage that consumes forty-two or forty-three days of actual running time and with the time at port about sixty days, transporting the mails 14,000 miles, will not be less than $40,000. Then is $4,000 per trip a reasonable and generous compensation? I think even my distinguished friend will not say that it is, and he will see that it is impossible for this private company, or any other company, to compete successfully against a line of steamships so heavily subsidized as is the Canadian line.

I should like to read from the Australian newspapers what they think of our action in relation to it, but I am reminded that time will not permit. The press of Australia reflects upon us for our niggardly policy in helping this ocean line of steamers. England alone, as I said last week in the debate, paid out nearly $2,000,000 more than she received for her ocean postage.

Mr. President, I will not trespass upon the Senate now except to read a telegram which I received a short time since, which I think is all the argument necessary for the Senate to vote to retain in the bill the amendment placed there by the Committee on Appropriations. It was from J. D. Spreckels, the president and manager of the Oceanic Steamship Company. The telegram is addressed to my colleague and myself, and it reads as follows:

Oceanic Steamship Company holds no contracts either with Australian or New Zealand Governments. What support it now receives from them is entirely voluntary and subject to withdrawal at any moment. These friendly and energetic colonies with 4,000,000 population have borne the burden of keeping an American line afloat in expectation that the United States with its 69,000,000 people would show a proportionate desire to maintain and further cultivate direct commercial relations. If present request for absolutely necessary and moderate assistance be denied, such action will unquestionably be construed as an expression of the future policy of the United States toward its ocean trade, and more directly as a disregard for the continuance of the Australian service under the American flag. This will undoubtedly result in transfer of entire colonial support to Canadian line and final extinction of direct service between United States and the colonies.

JOHN D. SPRECKELS,
President Oceanic Steamship Company.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from California has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, a word about the amendment I offered yesterday, which has been reached in the debate. On page 7, after line 25, I propose to add the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter all postage stamps required shall be obtained under the provisions of section 2709 of the Revised Statutes, and the contracts shall be awarded to the lowest and best bidder for the interests of the Government, and no bids of any branch of the Government shall be considered.

I propose the amendment in the hope that it will restore the old-fashioned way of getting the stamps by private contractors. In my judgment, indeed I know that the experiment at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was very expensive and resulted in the wasting, at least for a year or so, of a very large number of stamps. The work as previously done under contract by responsible companies was economical and was thorough and resulted, to the best of my recollection, in no loss whatever to the Government. We had better stamps, too, by all means. The general principle is that mechanical work of any sort that can just as well be done by private parties had better be done by them, for Government work on the whole, in many respects, is more costly.

This is all I desire to say on that. I did hope there might be a little debate on experimental free delivery. I desire to retain that service as the committee on the part of the Senate has endeavored to retain it. The experiments have been exceedingly interesting indeed. I have the figures from 24 towns, where not more than $215 was spent upon a town. In 24 towns of which I have statistics there was a handsome net increase of revenue from those offices, showing the benefits in ordinarily settled towns of an increase of free delivery.

Mr. BUTLER. In reference to the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin, to strike out from line 11 down to line 18, on page 6, I wish to say that in my opinion that subsidy should be stricken from the bill. It is a clear subsidy of $196,000 given as a free gift—you can not call it anything else—to one railroad company, now the Southern Railroad. The Atlantic Coast Line and the Southern Railroad Company are both anxious to get the contract from the Government to carry this mail. They both have fast mail facilities now. Either one would take it under the contract price. By adding the $196,000 the Government does not get a service one particle better for the money. Besides, as the Postmaster-General has said in his report every year, it is a discrimination against the other railroads in the country which simply get the contract price for carrying the mails. Of course, if any railroad is going to get it, I should like to see one running down through my State get it; but I oppose it simply because it is wrong. If the Government wants to go to making free gifts to railroad companies or individuals it is all right, but this is an appropriation of $196,000 without one single cent's service in return to the Government or for the improvement of the postal service.

Mr. ALLISON (at 5 o'clock p. m.). As the time allowed for debate has expired, I desire, with the leave of the Senate, to have printed in the RECORD a letter and accompanying statement of the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing respecting the cost of manufacturing postage stamps. I have not time to argue the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter and statement will be printed in the RECORD.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Bureau of Engraving and Printing, April 6, 1896.

SIR: In response to a message by telephone from you on Saturday last asking if I had read the statement of Representative BINGHAM as to the cost of manufacturing postage stamps made in the House of Representatives on the 2d instant, and what reply I have to make to the same, I beg to say that I have read the statement of Representative BINGHAM, which is based entirely on a condition that existed over one year ago, and all of the circumstances of which were fully discussed before the Appropriations Committees of both the House and the Senate at the last session of Congress.

When this Bureau undertook the work of manufacturing postage stamps it met with many unforeseen difficulties owing to the necessity for employing new machinery, untrained hands, and the use of materials with which the employees were not familiar, the most serious of which was the complaint regarding the gumming of the stamps, in October, 1894. These difficulties resulted in decreasing the volume of the regular work of this Bureau. This condition was most serious during the first six months of the last fiscal year, less so during the succeeding six months, and entirely disappeared during the current fiscal year. At no time while this condition lasted did this Bureau fail to supply the securities or stamps required by any branch of the public service. The statements of Representative BINGHAM, therefore, have no application to existing conditions, and are entirely misleading.

That the postage stamps are not costing in excess of the amount agreed upon between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General, I submit herewith a statement showing their cost, prepared under my personal direction:

At this point I beg to call your attention to a letter addressed by me to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives on the 11th of January, 1895, which will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 2d instant, at page 3861. In that letter I made a statement of the cost of producing stamps, which amounted to $18.0178 per thousand sheets. It will be seen that the statement submitted herewith shows the cost to be slightly in excess of this amount. As indicated in the letter to Governor SAYERS, it was my expectation to reduce this cost, but the improvements in the machinery contemplated at that time have not as yet proved successful, and it has been necessary to increase the expenditure for perforating wheels to avoid the ragged appearance of the stamps complained of and also to give them an additional pressing to prevent their curling in the hands of consumers. In connection with this letter I would be glad to call your attention to it as an exposition of the difficulties attending the manufacture of stamps prior to that time.

Mr. BINGHAM'S statement is also misleading with reference to the general work of this Bureau. I can say that its work is fully up to the highest standard ever attained, and we are as fully up to date with our orders as any Bureau of the service requires.

Being within three months of the end of the fiscal year, and with nine months' financial statement before us, estimating only for the remaining three months, it can be safely stated that the work of the Bureau will be done at a less cost to the Government this year than ever before in its history. In this connection I beg to call your attention to the fact that in submitting estimates for the fiscal year 1897, that I reduced the estimates for that year below those for prior years.

In submitting the proposition to the Postmaster-General for the execution of the postage stamps in this Bureau, I had simply in view the interests of the Government. It seemed to me that a security of the Government, which postage stamps undoubtedly are, that could be so easily used to its disadvantage, should be manufactured in the establishment which the Government was maintaining at a considerable outlay for the execution of just that class of work, and should have thrown around its manufacture the same safeguards and protection that are thrown around the other securities of the Government. When this could be done at a substantial saving in expenditure, it seemed to be my duty to call the attention of the Postmaster-General to that fact.

Notwithstanding the embarrassments that have beset this work since its transfer to this Bureau, through the hostility of the individuals and companies whose profits were thereby lessened, I am more than satisfied with the results, and believe that by the expiration of the four years during which the present agreement runs that my expectations as to the saving to the Government will be fully realized.

In response to your inquiry as to the amount of space in this building that is used in connection with the manufacture of postage stamps, I beg to say that there are 9,557 square feet used for the manufacture of such stamps.

In this connection I beg to say that the estimate submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury for outbuildings has, and will have, no effect upon the amount of space used in this building for the manufacture of postage stamps, for the reason that the outbuildings are intended to be used as ink mills, rag laundries, stables, and storerooms. The estimates for these outbuildings have been submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury yearly since 1878, and if the manufacture of postage stamps in this building were discontinued to-morrow, it would have no effect upon the amount of space needed in the outbuildings, because none of the work which is now executed in the old frame sheds that have been used as outbuildings since 1878 could be accommodated in the building.

Respectfully, yours, CLAUDE M. JOHNSON,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Senate Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add after the amendment already adopted, after line 2, on page 4, the following proviso:

Provided, That $50,000 of this amount be used to defray the expense of experiments in rural free delivery under the direction of the Postmaster-General, and that the amount heretofore appropriated for this purpose and still unexpended be available for said experiments.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). Under the transfer I made on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. GORDON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR]. I do not see him in his seat, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE]. I will transfer my pair to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY] and vote "yea."

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and vote "yea."

Mr. THURSTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. Not noticing his absence, I recorded my vote. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] whether he knows how the senior Senator from Vermont would vote upon this question?

Mr. PROCTOR. I am not able to state.

Mr. HARRIS. Then the safe thing for me to do is to withdraw my vote. I voted "nay."

Mr. PASCO. I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] has been compelled to leave the Chamber. He is paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Allen,	Chilton,	Martin,	Roach,
Bacon,	Clark,	Mills,	Shoup,
Bate,	Cockrell,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Stewart,
Berry,	Gallinger,	Nelson,	Vest,
Butler,	Hill,	Peffer,	Vilas,
Cannon,	Jones, Ark.	Pritchard,	Walthall.
Chandler,	McBride,	Pugh,

NAYS—25.

Allison,	Cullom,	Hoar,	Sewell,
Baker,	Daniel,	Lindsay,	Teller,
Blackburn,	Faulkner,	Lodge,	Wetmore,
Brice,	George,	McMillan,	White.
Brown,	Gray,	Mitchell, Wis.
Call,	Hale,	Perkins,
Carter,	Hawley,	Proctor,

NOT VOTING—37.

Aldrich,	Gibson,	Morrill,	Thurston,
Blanchard,	Gordon,	Murphy,	Tillman,
Burrows,	Gorman,	Palmer,	Turpie,
Caffery,	Hansbrough,	Pasco,	Voorhees,
Cameron,	Harris,	Pettigrew,	Warren,
Davis,	Irby,	Platt,	Wilson.
Dubois,	Jones, Nev.	Quay,	Wolcott.
Elkins,	Kyle,	Sherman,
Frye,	Mantle,	Smith,
Gear,	Morgan,	Squire,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. Has the amendment of the committee in regard to the subsidy to the Oceanic Steamship Company been disposed of?

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that a vote be now taken on the amendment of the committee relating to the Oceanic Steamship Company.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, after line 8, it is proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to insert:

For additional compensation to the Oceanic Steamship Company for transporting the mails by its steamers sailing from San Francisco to New Zealand and New South Wales by way of Honolulu, all mails made up in the United States destined for the Hawaiian Islands, the Australian colonies, New Caledonia, and the islands in the Pacific Ocean, $80,000: Provided, That said additional sum, with the sum now paid, shall not exceed $2 per mile, as authorized by act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce."

Mr. VILAS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg leave to state, so that it may be understood, that the question is upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment which has been stated.

Mr. VILAS. A vote "yea" is a vote for the subsidy, and a vote "nay" is a vote against the subsidy.

Mr. ALLEN (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. BURROWS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DANIEL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE].

Mr. GORMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BERRY. I have announced that I am paired with the Senator from Maine.

Mr. GORMAN. Then I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay." I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY] and vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin (when his name was called). On this single proposition I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and vote "yea."

Mr. HAWLEY. Permit me to say that my colleague [Mr. PLATT] would vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. MORGAN] is detained from the Senate by severe illness. I have agreed to pair with him on this vote. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. THURSTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I desire to transfer that pair to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who, I understand, if present, would vote for the amendment. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. Being paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] and record my vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] is paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE].

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRICE. As to the statement made by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], his colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] having been present during the day, I supposed he was in the Chamber and had voted. Under the circumstances, unless the senior Senator from Colorado is prepared to state how his colleague would vote, I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know, but I suppose my colleague would vote "yea." I did not hear how the Senator from Ohio voted.

Mr. BRICE. I voted "yea."

Mr. TELLER. I will pair my colleague with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who, I understand, is not paired. I do not know how my colleague would vote; but I suppose he would vote "yea," if present. I think both Senators would vote "yea." If the Senator from Ohio desires to vote "yea," I certainly shall not interfere with him.

Mr. BRICE. If the Senator from Colorado is at liberty to say that his colleague would vote "yea," I shall allow my vote to stand; otherwise I shall withdraw it. Unless he takes that responsibility I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. TELLER. I will change the pair of my colleague so that the Senator from Ohio may vote, if he chooses.

Mr. BRICE. Very well. Then I will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Allison,	Chandler,	Lodge,	Roach,
Baker,	Clark,	McBride,	Sewell,
Brice,	Cullom,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Brown,	Gallinger,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Stewart,
Burrows,	Hale,	Nelson,	Teller,
Call,	Hawley,	Perkins,	Thurston,
Cannon,	Hoar,	Pritchard,	Wetmore,
Carter,	Jones, Nev.	Proctor,	White.

Dubois,	Kyle,	Pugh,	Wolcott.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to present the amendment which I read a short time ago, but I ask to have it read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut will be stated from the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add after line 25, on page 7, the following:

Provided, That hereafter all postage stamps required shall be obtained under the provisions of section 2709 of the Revised Statutes, and the contracts shall be awarded to the lowest and best bidder for the interests of the Government, and no bids of any branch of the Government shall be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order on that amendment that it is new legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest on that point of order that the amendment is simply providing for the manner of disbursing money appropriated for stamps. I will strike out the word "hereafter," with the permission of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. That will not change it.

Mr. HAWLEY. It makes it apply solely to the appropriations of this year, and particularly to the legitimate application of the money.

Mr. FAULKNER. I suggest another point of order, that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. HAWLEY. Do we not change existing law if we modify in the slightest direction the manner in which money shall be expended?

Mr. FAULKNER. No; not when you prohibit a method of expenditure which the law now provides for. Then it changes the law.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think we are doing it every year in every appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Under the law as it now exists the Bureau of Engraving and Printing can bid and can take the contract. Under this amendment that Bureau is forbidden to do it. It does change existing law, and it does nothing else.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order submitted by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER].

Mr. VILAS. I ask that the vote be now taken on the amendment which I proposed, to strike out the appropriation for railroads.

Mr. DANIEL. That which has been existing for some years?

Mr. VILAS. It is one which has been existing for some years, and the Department has been for some years objecting to its being adopted.

Mr. HALE. Let the lines proposed to be stricken out be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] will be stated.

Mr. SEWELL. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin how long this appropriation has been in effect, and if he did not, when he was Postmaster-General, execute the same provision several times from year to year?

Mr. VILAS. No, Mr. President. This provision was first put on about three years ago, I think, after the other was discontinued. It is on an entirely different route, a different line; it has been objected to by the Post-Office Department for the last three or four years, and there is no estimate submitted for it.

Mr. SEWELL. I wish to say a word in this connection.

Mr. BERRY. I insist that debate is not in order under the agreement arrived at yesterday, and I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from New Jersey that, objection being interposed, debate is not in order.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask unanimous consent to correct a wrong impression that the Senate might derive from the statement of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], who said that this provision did not facilitate the transportation of the mails; that the train which was used was not faster than other trains. In a former term of service in this body I had heard debates which indicated that this same mail appropriation was then, ten years ago, in effect, and the statement made when objections were made to it was that the provision was to facilitate the delivery of the mail south twelve hours; that the train was originally put on, leaving Boston at night and New York at 4.30 in the morning, and that it practically carried little for a long distance but mail matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 10, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "service," in line 18; as follows:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Boston, Mass., by way of New York and Washington, to Atlanta and New Orleans, $196,614.22: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment which has been stated.

Mr. VILAS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLEN (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. BURROWS (when his name was called). On this question I transfer my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. He not being in his seat, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], and vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and vote "nay."

Mr. THURSTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], but I am advised that if present, he would vote "nay" upon this question, and I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] on this question. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TURPIE. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], but I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHOUP (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. SHOUP. I am paired with that Senator, and withdraw my vote.

Mr. FAULKNER. I suggest that the Senator from Idaho may transfer the pair he has with the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] to my colleague, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and vote.

Mr. SHOUP. That is acceptable to me, and I will let my vote in the negative stand.

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—13.

Bate,	George,	Mills,	Vilas.
Blackburn,	Harris,	Peffer,
Butler,	Jones, Ark.	Roach,
Cockrell,	Lindsay,	Turpie,

NAYS—39.

Allison,	Clark,	Jones, Nev.	Proctor,
Bacon,	Daniel,	Lodge,	Pugh,
Baker,	Faulkner,	McBride,	Sewell,
Brice,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Brown,	Gordon,	Martin,	Stewart,
Burrows,	Gorman,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Teller,
Call,	Hale,	Mitchell, Wis.	Thurston,
Cannon,	Hawley,	Nelson,	Walthall,
Carter,	Hill,	Perkins,	Wetmore.
Chandler,	Hoar,	Pritchard,

NOT VOTING—37.

Aldrich,	Elkins,	Morrill,	Tillman,
Allen,	Frye,	Murphy,	Vest,
Berry,	Gear,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Blanchard,	Gibson,	Pasco,	Warren,
Caffery,	Gray,	Pettigrew,	White,
Cameron,	Hansbrough,	Platt,	Wilson,
Chilton,	Irby,	Quay,	Wolcott.
Cullom,	Kyle,	Sherman,
Davis,	Mantle,	Smith,
Dubois,	Morgan,	Squire,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. VILAS. We have not yet executed the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. MILLS. I did not know that there was a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CULLOM. There is a unanimous-consent agreement that beginning at 5 o'clock we shall vote until we dispose of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. VILAS. The additional amendment of which I gave notice in reference to this paragraph is to reduce the amount to $175,000. Only $172,000, or a little less, was expended under this provision, and I understand the amendment is agreeable to the committee.

Mr. FAULKNER. Not since the other amendment has been adopted. We have taken off $50,000.

Mr. VILAS. Nothing has been taken off. The amendment simply makes the appropriation $175,000.

Mr. FAULKNER. An amendment was adopted which takes $50,000 off.

Mr. VILAS. Not from this paragraph.

Mr. HOAR. How can the committee depart from the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. VILAS. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] related to another part of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. To the free-delivery service.

Mr. VILAS. Yes, to the free-delivery service.

Mr. LODGE. Debate is not in order under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. VILAS. This is simply to make the amount of the appropriation correspond with the amount of the actual expenditure. The amount of the actual expenditure is $172,000.

Mr. HOAR. Debate has been objected to several times.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that debate is not in order. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

Mr. ALLEN. Let the amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 13, page 6, it is proposed to strike out the words "one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and fourteen dollars and twenty-two cents" and insert "one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars"; so as to read:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Boston, Mass., by way of New York and Washington, to Atlanta and New Orleans, $175,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

Mr. VILAS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLEN (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CALL. I do not think the amendment ought to be voted on before an explanation. Will the Senator from Wisconsin explain the amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection has been interposed to debate, the Chair will state to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. Explaining an amendment is not debate. We do not know what we are voting on.

Mr. HALE. Regular order. Debate is not in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The roll call will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I again announce the transfer of my pair to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] and I vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and vote "nay."

Mr. THURSTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. As I do not know how he would vote on this particular amendment, I refrain from voting.

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] to my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] and record my vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I inquire whether the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], but I have a memorandum from the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], stating that he is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] and that they are both in favor of this provision. I will therefore transfer my pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] and allow my vote to remain.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Allison,	Cockrell,	Peffer,	Turpie,
Bate,	George,	Perkins,	Vest,
Blackburn,	Harris,	Pettigrew,	Vilas,

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 626) providing for the disposal of lands on abandoned portions of the Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in Montana, and for the relief of certain settlers thereon.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7977) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 10,000 additional copies of the report of the Director of the Mint for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5161) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 9, 10, 13, 14, 15, 26, 33, 34, 35, and 46.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, and 52; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"One appointment clerk, $2,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert the following: "$94,340," and agree to the same.

S. M. CULLOM,
WILKINSON CALL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. W. WADSWORTH,
V. WARNER,
JOHN S. WILLIAMS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7977) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR OF THE MINT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 7, 1896.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 additional copies of the report of the Director of the Mint for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 5,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Director of the Mint.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF BOND SALES.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow morning, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution proposing an investigation of bond sales.

Mr. COCKRELL. A unanimous-consent agreement has been made for the consideration of another matter.

Mr. PEFFER. For the same time?

Mr. COCKRELL. For the same time.

Mr. PEFFER. Then I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed to the consideration of the resolution on Thursday, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. It is understood of course by the Senator from Kansas that that is not to interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. PEFFER. I so understand. I do not intend to antagonize appropriation bills or the privileged question.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HILL. I object to farming out the time of the Senate so far in advance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CANNON. I merely desired to ask that a place be kept for the unfinished business, but as the Senator from New York has objected to the request of the Senator from Kansas, I have nothing more to say.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] concludes his speech, I shall call up House bill 6249—the Indian appropriation bill.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH SYSTEM.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to give notice that on Thursday morning I shall ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up the bill (S. 2567) to establish a postal telegraph system and to enlarge the postal facilities of the people of the United States for the purpose of submitting some remarks thereon. If there is no objection, I wish to submit a few remarks, which will not be very lengthy, before the bill is referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 8, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 7, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FREE LIBRARY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill S. 1247, have had the same under consideration and report the same back with the recommendation that the House recede from its amendment.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the report of the committee be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill and amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1247) to establish and provide for a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That a free public library and reading room is hereby established and shall be maintained in the District of Columbia, which shall be the property of the said District and a supplement of the public educational system of said District. All actions relating to such library, or for the recovery of any penalties lawfully established in relation thereto, shall be brought in the name of the District of Columbia, and the Commissioners of said District are authorized on behalf of said District to accept and take title to all gifts, bequests, and devises for the purpose of aiding in the maintenance or endowment of said library; and the Commissioners of said District are further authorized to receive as component parts of said library collections of books and other publications that may be transferred to them.

SEC. 2. That all persons who are permanent or temporary residents of the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the privileges of said library, including the use of the books contained therein, as a lending or circulating library, subject to such rules and regulations as may be lawfully established in relation thereto.

SEC. 3. That the said library shall be in charge of a board of library trustees, who shall purchase the books, magazines, and newspapers, and procure the necessary appendages for such library. The said board of trustees shall be composed of nine members, each of whom shall be a taxpayer in the District of Columbia, and shall serve without compensation. They shall be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and shall hold office for six years: Provided, That at the first meeting of the said board the members shall be divided by lot into three classes. The first class, composed of three members, shall hold office for two years; the second class, composed of three members, shall hold office for four years; the third class, composed of three members, shall hold office for six years. Any vacancy occurring in said board shall be filled by the District Commissioners. Said board shall have power to provide such regulations for its own organization and government as it may deem necessary.

SEC. 4. That the said board shall have power to provide for the proper care and preservation of said library, to prescribe rules for taking and returning books, to fix, assess, and collect fines and penalties for the loss of or injury to books, and to establish all other needful rules and regulations for the management of the library as the said board shall deem proper. The said board of trustees shall appoint a librarian to have the care and superintendence of said library, who shall be responsible to the board of trustees for the impartial enforcement of all rules and regulations lawfully established in relation to said library. The said librarian shall appoint such assistants as the board shall deem necessary to the proper conduct of the library. The said board of library trustees shall make an annual report to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia relative to the management of the said library.

SEC. 5. That said library shall be located in some convenient place in the city of Washington to be designated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia upon the recommendation of the trustees of said library: Provided, That in any municipal building to be hereafter erected in said District suitable provision shall be made for said library and reading room sufficient to accommodate not less than 100,000 volumes.

SEC. 6. That the expenses of the maintenance of said library, including salaries of employees, shall be treated as among the current municipal expenses of said District, and it is hereby made the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to include these expenses in the annual estimates of the District of Columbia, transmitted by them to Congress, in accordance with the provisions of the act of June 11, 1878, regulating the transmission of said estimates and the appropriations by Congress to meet the same.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all of section 6 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 6. That all the expenses of the maintenance of said library, including salaries of the employees, shall be charged upon the revenue of the District of Columbia: Provided, That no liability shall be incurred under this act unless Congress shall have first made appropriations for the objects herein stated."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to address the House?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, this subject has been before the House——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont is recognized.

Mr. POWERS (continuing). And an amendment to the Senate bill was adopted by the House some days since.

I would be glad to have an arrangement made with the chairman of the committee in reference to the control of the time for debate upon this question. [After a pause.] It is agreed, Mr. Speaker, unless objection be made, between the chairman of the committee and myself, that I shall control the time in opposition to the proposition and the gentleman from Wisconsin shall control the time on that side.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Chair will consent to that agreement. Is there any limitation proposed to the debate?

Mr. BABCOCK. The proposition, Mr. Speaker, is that the debate be limited to two hours—an hour on each side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that debate be limited to two hours, to be equally divided, the gentleman from Wisconsin to control the time in favor of the proposition and the gentleman from Vermont to control the time in opposition.

Mr. DINGLEY. One moment. The bill has been debated pretty thoroughly by the House. Would not less time be sufficient?

Mr. POWERS. But this report recommends that the House recede from its amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes; but the same question has been thoroughly debated. Would not gentlemen be willing that a vote be had in one hour?

Mr. POWERS. Several gentlemen desire to be heard.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON].

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the pending motion, as I understand, is that the House recede from the amendment which it adopted to the Senate bill for the establishment of a public library in the District of Columbia. The effect of that amendment, as I understand, was that the District should bear the whole expense of the establishment of this library. The original bill, I believe, contemplated that the expense of the establishment and maintenance of the library should be divided, as the current expenses of the District are divided, between the District itself and the Government of the United States. The Senate has decided to insist upon the bill as originally passed. The pending proposition is that the House recede from its amendment.

So far as I am concerned, as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I feel to-day as I did when the bill was originally before the House, that the Government of the United States should bear its part of the expense of this library. I believe that the library is necessary for the good of the people of this District; that it is a legitimate item of expense to be charged up, as educational and other expenses are, to the joint account of the District and the United States.

I am aware that there is on the part of some members of this House an opinion that the District is expecting too much in the way of expenditures and that Congress is expending more than it should in carrying out matters of this kind. I do not so believe. I believe that the Congress of the United States owes to the District a duty that can not be fulfilled except in doing such things as the creation of this library. If it is proper that as to matters of streets, of courts, of educational expenditure the appropriations should fall equally upon the District and upon the United States, it seems to me this is a matter that comes properly within the same class.

If this House can send its sympathy to the downtrodden in Armenia; if it can use its time and means in looking after the mongrel Republic of Venezuela and threatening Great Britain; if it can devote its time and money to looking after Cuba, then it does seem to me that there is nothing out of place in asking that it devote some of its time and means to the proper education of the people of this District.

Members seem to forget to a certain extent the obligation resting upon the Government of the United States and upon Congress to look after the District of Columbia. This great city of Washington was founded for the purpose of being a Federal city. The capital was established here by act of Congress; and the first President of the United States, whose name it bears, was the agent of the Government in purchasing the ground and laying out the streets here; and he did so in such a manner as to make this a proper city for the capital of the nation. This being the case, there have been entailed upon citizens of the District expenses that would not otherwise have fallen upon them. This being the Federal city, it is the business of Congress, having assumed to do certain things for the benefit of the people here, to do this as well. Why? I say if it is necessary to have schools for the education of the people, it is necessary also in this age and under existing circumstances to have a public library here. The public library affords education to the workingmen of our land. When any one of our citizens leaves school at an early age and goes to work by the day, the public library gives him an opportunity to improve his mind in the hours of the night.

The greatest men of this country have been benefited by books that were borrowed, either from the public library or from individuals. The great President of the United States who stands to-day as the greatest of all Americans gave himself his education by reading borrowed books in the hours of the night by the fitful glimmer of the light that came to him from the fireplace as he lay before it. In affording the means of self-education the public library meets the wants of our young men and even our youth from the time that they leave school. The young men and the men of mature age who are going to their work from day to day in this District should have the opportunity of further educating themselves by a public library. Such a library is a suitable charge as part of the current expenses of the District, and if any part of those expenses is properly payable by Congress this expenditure is.

I do not feel it proper at this moment to take up further the time of the House. This subject was thoroughly discussed when this bill was first passed. I believe if this question be investigated carefully and dispassionately, if it be considered what this House and the Senate and the Government owe the people here, it will be acknowledged that this is a proper charge upon the joint funds of the United States and the District, and that the House should recede from its amendment and pass the bill as the Senate sent it to us.

Mr. POWERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT].

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the same opposition to the passage of this bill that I did when it came up in the House before, only a few days ago, when it was amended requiring the citizens of the District of Columbia to pay for the library themselves. I hold that to establish a free library in the District of Columbia at the expense of the taxpayers of the whole country is taxing the many for the benefit of the few. I submit that this is against the theory and the principles of the Government under which we live; that it is taxation without representation.

It is urged by gentlemen on the other side of this question that the Government owns one-half of the real estate in the District of Columbia. I deny the correctness of that proposition; but conceding it for the sake of argument to be true, I ask, does the property of the Government want books, and will the property of the Government be benefited by the establishment of a free library? Not at all; consequently it would be unjust to tax property or people when no corresponding benefit would accrue therefrom.

It is urged that there are people here from all over the United States in the employment of the Government who will be benefited by the establishment of this library. I admit the fact; but in addition to that fact is the fact that these employees draw from the Government from eighteen million dollars to twenty-one or twenty-two millions yearly; they are the best paid employees in the nation. And are the people throughout the nation who follow the plow, who stand at the forge, who work in the factories, to be taxed for the benefit of these people here, many of whom, compared with many of the laboring men throughout the country, are "living in clover"?

I submit that such a proceeding is not right. These employees of the Government are here spending their salaries, many of them going to the theaters and other entertainments, and yet clamoring for expenditures of this kind in their interest, when many poor laborers throughout the country have not the necessaries of life, to say nothing of the luxuries. And I submit, sir, that it is not right for Senators and Members of Congress of the United States who own property in the District of Columbia to continually come here and insist on taxing the people of the United States for their benefit and the benefit of the few, against the theory and the principles on which our Government is based. I am willing that all taxes expended for the schools, for improving the streets, for improving the parks, and for works of that character shall be divided according to the obligation imposed by the act of 1878. That is just and right. But to extend it further, to tax all the people to establish a free circulating library for the benefit of a few in this city, is precisely the same in principle as to go further and tax the whole people to buy the carriages, the horses, the bicycles, or to furnish street-car tickets for all the people of the District of Columbia as well as to furnish them with books. There is no difference as far as the principle is concerned; and, sir, I submit it is wrong in theory, wrong in practice, and I can not and will not cast my vote in favor of any such proposition as that.

I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House on this occasion will again vote down this monstrous proposition to tax the people of this country for the benefit of the few in this District who will reap the advantages of it. Now, sir, in my opposition to this bill I do not deny that public libraries are great necessities and disseminators of knowledge and light, but at the same time I maintain that one class of citizens should not be unjustly taxed for their establishment without corresponding benefit. I am perfectly willing that the District of Columbia should have the right to tax themselves for this object, but not the whole people, and my vote will be against it.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I yield ten minutes now to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I take it that no argument is needed in the American Congress in favor of a free public library. If there is, if anyone at this day needs this question discussed, I am not going to discuss it with him.

The question really involved here, as I understand it, is, shall the Government of the United States and the government of the District of Columbia pay in equal proportion these expenses, or shall the people of the District alone pay for it?

Now, there are a few thoughts that I would like to submit to the members of the House in this connection, first stating that I am, without reserve, in favor of the Government and the District of Columbia sharing these expenses equally. In the first place, it must not be forgotten that the General Government has donated, from the public domain of this country, millions of acres of land for educational purposes to the various States and Territories, while on the other hand the District of Columbia has given to the General Government nearly five-sevenths of the whole soil owned by the United States in this District and has received no aid for educational purposes in exchange for it.

Again, when this donation of the soil of the District was made to the General Government it was upon the theory, and recognized by all at the time, that this would be built up as a great city with all of the advantages which should belong to the great capital city of a nation like the United States. No advantage in the way of educational facilities can be greater—save and excepting only the public schools—than that afforded by a free public library.

Again, the General Government has spent many thousands of dollars in keeping up the libraries in the several Departments of the Government, to which our force of clerks in this city, somewhere in the neighborhood of 20,000, have access. If this provision is carried out as now proposed in the pending report, and a free public library established in the District, that expense in the various Departments will be substantially saved.

But now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the fundamental question involved in this proposition, and call your attention to the fact that the act of 1878 made the District of Columbia and the General Government in a sense partners in respect to the expenditures of the District. Since that time, or rather within a very few years past, there has been manifested from time to time a disposition on the part of various members of Congress to destroy this law by indirection, though not by an effort for its absolute repeal. One gentleman, my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], has come at it in a more manly way, from time to time, and sought to strike down the law of 1878 in the general appropriation bills for the District of Columbia. But I do not know of any member of Congress since that law was adopted who has ever introduced a bill to repeal the act of 1878 and change the system of doing business with reference to the District of Columbia.

Now, I like a good, square fighter, a man whose position you can always understand; and if it is the purpose of any gentleman who represents the people on this floor to seek to repeal the act of 1878 and put the entire burden of the expenditures of the District, the expenses for schools, of opening the streets, the repairs of the streets, the maintenance of the police force, the fire department, and all of the varied machinery necessary for a city of this size entirely upon the people of the District of Columbia, let us get at it in a manly way by repealing the act of 1878 and put a new act on the statute book in its stead. But with that law on the statute book, with that principle governing the relations between the General Government and the District of Columbia, and recognized as binding upon both, I do not think that these indirect assaults upon the principle are wise or legitimate, and certainly it is not a manly way to approach the subject. And in saying this, Mr. Speaker, I am making no personal reflection upon any member of this House. It does seem to me, though, that the right way is to take up the subject of reorganizing these relations in a general way upon a bill reported for that purpose and then test the judgment of Congress and see if there is a disposition, or if it is deemed proper, to repeal the act of 1878.

And now, Mr. Speaker, as supplementary to my discussion of the pending question, I submit that in this age of civilization and advancement of the training of the popular mind, the reaching into the homes of what Mr. Lincoln called "our common people," by means of the educational facilities offered on all hands—I ask if there is anything that can exhibit more clearly and forcibly the value of the principles involved in the act of 1878 than the establishment of a free public library for the use of the boys, the girls, the men, and the women of this District? Because I contend, sir, that every law and every appropriation that broadens the field for the education of the people of this capital city, every statute that tends to elevate the people as a whole, is a benefit and a direct benefit to the entire Republic; and if you are going to contribute toward the sweeping of the streets or the paving of the streets, will you refuse to bear your just proportion of the expense of a free public library for this people?

Why, my friends, the spirit of the age is in the direction of allowing the taxation of each State for the establishment of free public libraries. In almost every county of my own district in Iowa there is to-day a free public library kept up at the public expense, in pursuance of the statutory law of that State; and that spirit is spreading throughout the whole length and breadth of the land. Let it not be said that one of the partners in this city has sneaked out of sight when it comes to the opening of a free public library to the citizens of the District of Columbia. Our people, the children of your army of 20,000 clerks, the clerks themselves, your own families, are deeply interested in this matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel almost as though it was an insult to this House to dwell at length upon this theme. I hope that this body, overwhelmingly Republican, will register its action in favor of standing by existing law and standing by the great cause of education. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, there can be no controversy between the gentleman who has just taken his seat and ourselves upon the question of the general utility of public libraries. No one denies it. That is not the issue involved in this bill.

This bill provides for the establishment of a public library. There is nothing stated in the bill concerning the amount which is to be appropriated or what the library is to cost. It is an entering wedge for the creation of a library the expense of which we do not know and can not tell. That it involves an amount which will be great can not be denied, not only in the purchase of books, but before long we shall find a bill introduced in this body providing for the erection of a library building. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we have the finest library in the city of Washington that can be found on the globe; and what is the necessity of creating another public library, with perhaps another public building, in order to accommodate the people in the District of Columbia? You have a library that has duplicate volumes of every publication that is made. You say that the workingmen in this city do not have access to that library. Why do you not give it to them? Why can not a resolution be passed permitting any person to take a volume from that library? It may be said that it is for the use of Congress; but when we find that these books are in duplicate, and that the librarian could exercise a wide discretion in giving out books, and in withholding from circulation the rare or costly books, we find that there is nothing of substance in that objection. Here you have expended $7,000,000 for the erection of the most magnificent library building in the world. It is ample to give accommodations to every one who wants to read. It contains sufficient volumes to let any workingman, or any other person who desires to read, get the volume he desires. And to say that right within this city, alongside of that library building, you should erect another is, it seems to me, a proposition for a useless expenditure of public money.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that the Government has agreed to pay one-half of the municipal expenditures that are made by the District of Columbia. That policy may be wise or it may be unwise. In ordinary municipal affairs that might be considered by some a proper provision; but, Mr. Speaker, this is an extraordinary expenditure. It is an expenditure that does not pertain to the municipality itself. It may be considered a very laudable object, but not a municipal expenditure as ordinarily understood. There are very few of the municipalities in these United States which have free public libraries supported by the city governments, compared to the number of municipalities that have not. When we take into consideration that this is a useless expense, which, it seems to me, will involve the Government ultimately to the extent of thousands and perhaps millions of dollars, there is no necessity for the passage of this bill.

Mr. POWERS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY].

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, in opposing the proposition of the Committee on the District of Columbia I do not seek to controvert at all the statement that there is need in the District for a free public library. On the contrary, I admit that there is need here for such a library, to which all the residents of the District may have free access. It is properly said that the Library of Congress is in large part made up of books which can not go out into popular circulation. They ought to be preserved and protected. Therefore it is a perfectly proper thing that somewhere in this District there should exist a library open to the free use of the people and to circulation among the people; but that is not the question which is before this House to-day for determination, and I deny the right of the supporters of this proposition, as it comes from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to put upon us who oppose that proposition the odium of any opposition to a free public library. We do not oppose it. We think that one ought to be established, but the only question before the House is, What funds ought to contribute and pay the expense of this public library, which is for the use and benefit of the citizens of the District?

Mr. Speaker, when this question was before this House for the first time in this session, on the 9th day of March last, I had the honor to submit a few remarks, in which I called the attention of the House to the fact that while on the one hand the national revenues are at present insufficient to pay the ordinary expenses of running the Government of the United States, on the other hand the District revenues, raised here by taxation, and by very reasonable and low taxation, upon the property of the citizens of this District, are more than ample to provide for the share which the District must pay of the ordinary municipal expenses, and to pay besides the whole cost of establishing and maintaining this proposed library, indefinite though these expenses be, and yet to leave a magnificent surplus in the revenues of the District.

I called the attention of the House to the fact that the estimates of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of the revenues of the District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, amounted to $3,225,081.56, and that for the last three years those revenues have been over $3,000,000 per annum. I called the attention of the House to the fact that the total amount of appropriations for the municipal expenses of this District for the fiscal year 1896 was only $5,559,263.97, and that the amount carried in the District of Columbia appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, as reported to this House and passed by this House, is only $5,225,365.97. Now, of these expenditures, by force of the act of 1878, one-half comes out of the National Treasury, and therefore only one-half has to be provided for out of the District revenues. That half amounts to $2,612,683, so that of the estimated revenues, being $3,225,000, there is a surplus of $612,398 remaining, which money, I submit in all fairness and candor, ought to be applied to this local purpose before the deficient national revenues should be called upon to contribute one cent for the purpose.

Now, there is no question, I repeat, of opposing the library; and I submit that the odium shall not be put upon us for any such opposition. There is no question about giving the use of the library fully and freely to all the citizens of the District of Columbia; but I do submit that, inasmuch as it is a local benefit, it ought to be paid for wholly out of the local revenues.

Mr. Speaker, I should not think it necessary for me to speak further upon this matter—especially since the question is the same as that which was before the House on the 9th of March, and then decided in favor of my present contention—were it not for the fact that from that time, when the amendment in question was put upon this bill upon the motion of the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], until the present time, numerous articles have from time to time appeared in the public press of this District containing sneers upon those members of Congress who, in obedience to their convictions, had the courage to oppose this proposition that the National Treasury should be saddled with one-half of the indefinite cost of this public library. It has been sneeringly said that it is the new members who oppose this great public benefit, and that after they have lived in Washington a few terms and acquired property here they will be in favor of such propositions as this.

Mr. Speaker, an insinuation of that sort is an insult to the American Congress, and I for one resent it; and if it were true (which I deny) that by some sort of blandishment, or by inducements being held out to purchase property here, influences could be brought to bear on members of Congress to be more favorable to the plan of originating and supporting local improvements at the expense of the National Treasury, then it might be questionable whether the law ought not to be changed so as to deny to Representatives the right to hold property here.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Does the gentleman think that would be permissible under the Constitution?

Mr. PITNEY. I will leave it to my friend the constitutional lawyer from New York to raise the constitutional objection. [Laughter.] I think it would be absurd, whether constitutional or not, and the insinuation thrown out by the public press is absurd also that any member of Congress should be or would be influenced in his action here by the ownership of property.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the gentleman think it would be quite proper to provide that citizens should not own property in the municipality where they reside? Would that disqualify them from looking into the interests of the city? Would it not have the other tendency?

Mr. PITNEY. I do not intend to make any such insinuation. I simply refer to the articles that have been printed in the public newspapers of this town.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If the gentleman will permit me—do you favor opening the Congressional Library to the public, free?

Mr. PITNEY. I would not, without further investigation, commit myself in favor of the plan of opening the Congressional Library to the free use of the citizens, without restrictions. Some sort of restrictions would have to be imposed upon such a privilege. That is not the proposition I am advocating here, but an entirely different one.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Has not the cost of that Library been paid for entirely by the General Government?

Mr. PITNEY. Of course.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Then, if we should open it, we would offer this to the citizens as a free library without it having cost them a cent.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But would not it be a saving to the Government to do that?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I think not.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say further that I resent the insinuation, contained in the public press, that it is those members who come from the less enlightened portions of the community, if any such are to be found in this broad land, who oppose this proposition. Now, any fair argument that may be brought to bear upon Congress upon any question of this sort will not be subject to criticism; but I submit that it is improper and indecent to use such arguments as the public press have used in undertaking to whip Congress into line to support a proposition of this sort, for the local benefit, and to have it paid for in part out of the public Treasury.

The question of the repeal of the act of 1878 is not involved here. That act provided that, as to all municipal expenditures which were then provided for by law, the national Treasury should contribute one-half and the District revenues one-half. But that act, in so far as it constituted a bargain or arrangement between the District and the National Government, was limited by its terms and applied only to the objects which were then upon the statute book and which were at that time regarded as public objects; and it necessarily follows that whenever any proposition for a new local improvement is brought before us we must consider it as an independent proposition, and make up our minds whether we ought to go further than Congress has gone in the act of 1878 in the direction of saddling the local burdens of the District of Columbia upon the public Treasury.

Now, I am not proposing the repeal of the act of 1878, but there is no more doubt than there is that we are here that that act is exceedingly favorable to the people of the District of Columbia, and if the issue must be raised—and the local press here seem to desire to raise it—if the issue must be raised between the interests of the District of Columbia and the interests of the rest of the country, my humble opinion is that the representatives of the people in Congress will stand first for the interests of the whole country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I think the other side ought now to proceed to occupy some of its time.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRISWOLD].

Mr. GRISWOLD. I do not rise, sir, because I have any additional light to throw upon this subject, but because I feel that the people of the United States take special pride, not only in this country and its institutions, but in its capital city, and that it is not only their wish and desire, but their purpose, that this city be made the exponent of progress; that when they visit this city they shall find here the best and most advanced evidences of progress; that they shall find streets well lighted, good sewers, water of the purest quality, well filtered; that they shall find also advanced development in the line of education, and the best embodiments of progress in its true import. Now, what more efficient means, I would ask you, sir, than education have we to stimulate progress, and what more important adjunct to education have we than libraries? But it has been stated that we have already a library here. That is true; but I insist, sir, that our Congressional Library is more a library of record than a library for public use. The design of it is that every publication shall be found there; but how long would they or could they be found there if they were subject to being loaned to this man or that man? Large numbers of the volumes would disappear, and the main object of that Congressional Library would thus be defeated.

In my opinion, sir, an appeal to the country on this question would elicit an almost unanimous response in favor of liberal contributions by Congress toward the expenses of this District in order to secure its proper development in the directions I have indicated. As I was saying, the people of the United States are not picayune in reference to this matter. They believe in a liberal expenditure, and when they speak of the city of Washington they want to be able to speak of it with pride. Therefore I do not believe that this House is not justified in passing this bill. The objection that the expenditure is unlimited can easily be remedied. As a city Washington is to-day certainly far behind many of the cities of the country in its public works, and the surplus in the revenues of the District to which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] has referred, and not only that, but a much larger sum, might well be expended for the further development of this capital city, and even then Washington would be behind many cities in the United States. I sincerely hope, sir, and for my part I urge, that this bill shall receive a favorable vote.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS].

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I do not take the floor for the purpose of entering into the discussion of this question, but solely to say that I shall vote for the motion to recede, because I believe the House should take that course. I can not see any reason why in this case we should depart from the rule which has uniformly prevailed of paying one-half of these expenditures out of the public Treasury. As I understand, there is no proposition to purchase a building for this library, or that it shall purchase books to put in it, but simply that the employees of the library, when it is once established, shall be compensated as other Government employees are compensated, out of the public Treasury. At most it can be but a small amount. I believe the library will redound greatly to the usefulness of the public-school system in this District, that it will be a public benefit in many ways, and it certainly seems to me that we should promote rather than retard so valuable an enterprise. I do not wish to say anything more, Mr. Speaker. I shall vote for the motion myself, and I trust that the House will adopt it.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, it is always best when the House has a measure under consideration that members should know precisely the question that is in issue. There is no occasion for any gentleman on this floor to charge upon those of us who oppose this proposition that we are seeking to have the Government sneak out of an obligation that it is honorably bound to under the provisions of the act of 1878. We stand here, sir, insisting that the provisions of that act are being violated by the terms of this bill. If gentlemen on the floor of this House will take the trouble to look at the language of the act of 1878 they will learn that when that law was enacted it provided merely for the necessary municipal expenses of the District of Columbia. If they will go a step farther and look into the debate which covered a long period of time during that session of Congress, they will find that it was expressly stated by the friends of the proposed change of system that the people of the United States, represented by its General Government, would never be called upon to pay anything beyond ordinary and necessary expenses of the District.

I have taken occasion to review that discussion as it transpired on this floor and at the other end of this Capitol, and from beginning to end the proposition was bitterly opposed on the theory that it would lead to just the kind of extravagant expenditures that have followed in the train of that legislation. The bill was defeated once in this House for fear that the Government would be called upon to assume the old debt of the District of Columbia, and it finally was passed only because of a provision that the Government should merely guarantee interest on the 3.65 bonds. But we have been told on this floor during this discussion that one-half of that entire debt of $20,000,000 has already been shouldered upon the Government of the United States, and I am inclined to think, sir, from a careful reading of the legislation between 1878 and the present time, that that result has really been accomplished and that the purpose of the gentlemen who urged that measure has been fully realized, namely, to make the Government of the United States a stalking horse to carry the load that ought to rest upon the people of this District.

Now, sir, we do not stand here to ask any parsimonious action on the part of this House. We stand here saying amen to this bill to establish a free circulating library, provided that the people who are interested, and who alone are interested, in it shall incur the expense, just as the people of your cities and of my cities and of all the cities throughout the country do when they undertake to establish libraries for their people. I have alluded to the fact that little by little encroachments have been made upon the theory of the act of 1878, until, if gentlemen will review the legislation that has been enacted since that time, it will make their hair stand. Twenty millions of debt has been loaded upon the Government of the United States in violation of the proposition and the theory upon which the act of 1878 was passed.

Now, sir, during the last discussion of this question when my friend from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], unacquainted with the way in which these things are done here, remarked in his innocent manner: "If this thing goes on a little longer we shall be confronted with a proposition for the establishment of free bath houses for the people of this District." A gentleman upon this floor, who is always active and zealous in behalf of such legislation, rose and triumphantly replied: "We already have that." I have taken occasion to look up that legislation, and I have here an interesting document to which I wish to call the attention of members. In the Fifty-first Congress a bill was passed appropriating $3,000 for the establishment of free bath houses for the benefit of the people of this District. Under that bill the expense was put upon the revenues of the District. But the argument here is that any expense that you can properly put upon the revenues of the District is chargeable, under the terms of the act of 1878, one-half to the United States. So, if the argument amounts to anything, that expense ought to have been shared by your constituents and my constituents at home.

Now, I hold in my hand a report made by the chairman of the District Committee in the Fifty-first Congress upon that bill, from which I read:

Mr. GROUT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7056) establishing a free public bathing beach on the Potomac River near the Washington Monument, submitted the same to the District Commissioners.

Then the report goes on to say that—

The Commissioners are in favor of the enactment of House bill 7056, establishing a free public bathing beach on the Potomac River near the Washington Monument, referred to them.

The report further says—and I ask the attention of the House to it, because it shows just the kind of legislation that has been enacted upon this system—

The objects and scope of the bill are well set forth in a memorial of citizens of the District of Columbia, which we attach and make a part of this report.
The committee report back this bill to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

The memorial is as follows, and I ask the attention of members to this memorial and to the class of citizens who are quoted as recommending the appropriation:

In presenting the accompanying bill for your consideration the undersigned, officers of the Washington Beach Association, beg leave to state concerning its objects and the necessity for its enactment as follows—

The reasons that are adduced, and which are recommended by the committee of this House as a sufficient warrant for this appropriation of $3,000, are these—

Every year many persons are drowned in the Potomac—

That is the first reason—

some because they could not swim, others because they stole away to get out of the policeman's reach, and were consequently beyond help in their time of need.

Well, now, if that was a proper municipal expense, then at home in Vermont, where I live, in Ohio, or elsewhere, where you gentlemen live, if a man happens to get drowned or is running away from a public officer to get drowned, you must establish a bathing beach so that his life may be saved.

Every person over 5 years old should be able to swim so well as to feel perfectly at ease in deep water.

[Laughter.]

You can see what profound philosophy underlies this legislation—every person over 5 years of age should be able to swim, and to feel at home in doing so.

Besides the residents of the city there are hundreds of persons employed in the Departments who can not leave their duties to go to the seashore in the heated term—

Therefore there must be a swimming place provided for them. How many people have you gentlemen in your districts who are in the same unfortunate condition; but did you ever think of going to the legislature to have them relieved by the establishment of a place where they could go in swimming?— and who would gladly avail themselves of the luxury of frequent bathing if a suitable place could be had in open water.

Here is a still further reason given:

Even home bath tubs can not be had by all; and they do not offer to any that invigorating tonic which comes from the relaxation of open-water bathing with family and friends to help enjoy it.

Mr. Speaker, the proposition is that these unfortunates have no bath tubs at home and that they must have a place for open-water bathing where they can take their families and their friends to help enjoy it. Do gentlemen on this floor when they are at home, when the boys go in swimming or they themselves go in swimming, take along with them their families and friends to help enjoy the luxury of open-water bathing?

To form a suitable beach for bathing purposes at a point on the Potomac River convenient to the Washington public.
To maintain order and decorum upon the beach and its surroundings, and to enforce such regulations as tend to the free enjoyment of the beach as a bathing place for all respectable and well-disposed persons.
The first necessity was a place where there is no current to enter the water.

It is proposed by the bill to lead the boys of Washington down by the "still water" so that they may enjoy going in to swim with their families and friends to help them! [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. There ought to be some "green pastures."

Mr. POWERS. My friend here suggests that there ought to be close by some green pastures; he will find that that is duly provided for.

A location was selected beside the Monument Lot. A narrow strip of the bottom and shore was graded and the soft slimy mud, which everywhere prevails, was covered with gravelly sand, making a nice clean bottom; a small rough house was built with two compartments for dressing, and this little beginning was a lively scene from morning till night—

From youth to hoary age should have been added—until the weather was too cool for comfort. Over 150 boys—

In this great city of 275,000 inhabitants—

about 150 boys a day on an average bathed freely on this beach, even though the house was not open to them and they had to hide in the tall weeds to dress.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to ask for information whether it was recommended also that the Government furnish convenient bathing suits?

Mr. POWERS. Wait a minute.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just think of the terrible embarrassment that the boys of Washington are under when they go down to the Potomac to go in swimming by reason of being obliged to go into the tall weeds to dress. That thing should be remedied, and this bill, as will be seen, did it.

The experiment was a success—

Says the memorial—

The experiment was a success, and met with universal approbation and large promises of membership for the coming season. But now a more roomy beach is desirable, in order that the whole public may enjoy it freely under proper restrictions as to clothing and conduct. By consulting with Colonel Hains, who heartily indorses this move, we have ascertained that the expense of forming the sea wall and making the fill required according to the present plan of filling the flats would grade a beach 100 feet wide from a line 5 feet deep under water at low tide, and cover the same with sand and gravel to the required depth to maintain its stability, and build suitable dressing houses with separate personal compartments.

So every boy that goes down there to go in swimming is to have a separate compartment in which to dress without being humiliated like your boys and mine when they go in swimming by being obliged to dress in the tall weeds.

To make a beautiful beach for 500 feet along the shore, graded from the level of the ball ground to deep water, cover it with sand, and provide houses to accommodate 100 bathers at a time would cost only $3,000, and about that much would be spent on that shore without the beach.

Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House I incorporate in my remarks the whole of that report from which I have read extracts:

Mr. GROUT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted the following report on H. R. 7056:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7056) establishing a free public bathing beach on the Potomac River near the Washington Monument, submitted the same to the District Commissioners, and they say: "The Commissioners are in favor of the enactment of House bill 7056, establishing a free public bathing beach on the Potomac River near Washington Monument, referred to them."

The bill was also referred to the Secretary of War and by him to the office of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, where a favorable report was submitted by Gen. Thomas Lincoln Casey and by Col. Peter C. Hains and Col. O. H. Ernst.

The objects and scope of the bill are well set forth in a memorial of citizens of the District which we attach and make a part of this report.

The committee report back this bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

In presenting the accompanying bill for your consideration the undersigned officers of the Washington Beach Association beg leave to state concerning its object and the necessity for its enactment as follows: Every year many persons are drowned in the Potomac; some because they could not swim, others because they stole away to get out of the policeman's reach, and were consequently beyond help in their time of need. Every person over 5 years old should be able to swim so well as to feel perfectly at ease in deep water.

Besides the residents of the city there are hundreds of persons employed in the Departments who can not leave their duties to go to the seashore in the heated term, and who would gladly avail themselves of the luxury of frequent bathing if a suitable place could be had in open water. Even home bath tubs can not be had by all, and they do not offer to any that invigorating tonic which comes from the relaxation of open-water bathing with family and friends to help enjoy it. This subject has been more or less discussed in the papers every year, but none took measures to accomplish the desired end until this association was formed with the following-stated objects:

To enable ladies, girls, and children, as well as men and boys, to obtain the benefits and pleasure of open-water bathing.

To form a suitable beach for bathing purposes at a point on the Potomac River convenient to the Washington public.

To maintain order and decorum upon the beach and its surroundings, and to enforce such regulations as tend to the free enjoyment of the beach as a bathing place for all respectable and well-disposed persons.

The first necessity was a place where there is no current to enter the water. A location was selected beside the Monument Lot. A narrow strip of the bottom and shore was graded and the soft, slimy mud, which everywhere prevails, was covered with gravelly sand, making a nice, clean bottom; a small, rough house was built with two compartments for dressing, and this little beginning was a lively scene from morning till night, even until the weather was too cool for comfort. Over 150 boys a day on an average bathed freely on this beach, even though the house was not open to them and they had to hide in the tall weeds to dress. The better class was fully represented, and sons of Congressmen enjoyed it as much as any.

The experiment was a success, and met with universal approbation and large promises of membership for the coming season. But now a more roomy beach is desirable, in order that the whole public may enjoy it freely under proper restrictions as to clothing and conduct. By consulting with Colonel Hains, who heartily indorses this move, we have ascertained that the expense of forming the sea wall and making the fill required according to the present plan of filling the flats would grade a beach 100 feet wide from a line 5 feet deep under water at low tide and cover the same with sand and gravel to the required depth to maintain its stability and build suitable dressing houses with separate personal compartments; to make a beautiful beach for 500 feet along the shore, graded from the level of the ball ground to deep water, cover it with sand, and provide houses to accommodate 100 bathers at a time, would cost only $3,000, and about that much would be spent on that shore without the beach. Under the direction of the Commissioners Major Moore furnished policemen to patrol this region, and the boys bathed in safety under a restraining hand. We now ask that the said Commissioners be instructed by Congress to take charge of the whole matter for the public benefit.

This matter should be acted upon without delay, because work is now being done which might be saved by the beach plan of construction, and because, by grading the beach now and allowing the earth to settle for a while before the sand is leveled over it, a better foundation will be insured and the beach may be ready for use the coming season. Let the capital of the nation have this little space to approach the broad Potomac unbarred by wall or mud, is the prayer of your humble petitioners.

JOHN B. CLARK.
P. L. TATE.

We shall be glad to present a plan and the result of experience to aid the committees of Congress in shaping their instructions to the Commissioners at your convenience.

Please address W. X. Stevens, No. 705 G street northwest, Washington, D. C.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, this is only one sample of the kind of legislation that has gone through Congress here under the whip and spur of a tremendous lobby interest such as is working to carry this bill through. I want to ask every gentleman on the floor how he can go home to his constituents and justify the expenditure of public money for matters of that kind. If anyone thinks he can do it he is welcome to the job. I do not want to undertake it.

Now, as I have already said, such expenses were never contemplated under the act of 1878. I dispute the proposition that there is no opportunity to get books out of the pubic libraries in this city. The Congressional Library has always been open to the public. The only restriction that has ever been complained of was that when a stranger went there to borrow a book he must make a deposit equal to its value in order to insure its return. Well, could you establish a library on the principle of a free circulating library such as you propose in this District on any other basis than that? Would every stranger who knocked at the doors of the library and asked permission to take a book out be permitted to get it without any security for its return and with no knowledge of who he was? Not at all. Every stranger in any city who goes to a public library, a circulating library, is bound either to be introduced by some one who knows him or else make a money deposit to secure the return of the book borrowed, and only in this way can he establish his right to draw books. It is an entirely natural and reasonable requirement.

And not only that, but they tell us that the clerks in the various Departments must have a new library. Sir, it is true that every Department of the Government has already a library, bought by Congress, established by Congress, and opened for the exclusive benefit of the employees of that special Department. But the regulations of the Department have been such that they have been closed at 4 o'clock, the moment the clerks are relieved from duty. Now, how easy and simple to correct that. All that is necessary is to pass a joint resolution requiring them to be kept open an hour longer than the term of service of the employees. When you do that, do you not meet that demand? Pass a joint resolution that the Congressional Library shall be open to the public under reasonable restrictions and regulations. Do you not thereby supply the demand for books in this city without establishing this entering wedge to what will hereafter become an expenditure of millions for some gigantic building for the benefit of the people of the District?

Now, sir, I insist that this is not a proper municipal expenditure. The act of 1878 enumerates the kind of municipal expenditures that are to be provided for. It provides for highways, lights, and other current expenditures of the District, such as water, the expense of the Commissioners, and such things as that; and that is all the kind of expenses that are mentioned in the law.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me a question just there?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. The report of the committee does not set out the effect of the amendment at all. Now, if the House recedes from the amendment that it adopted to the Senate bill heretofore, in accordance with the recommendation of the District Committee, will the city of Washington pay any part of the expenses of this library?

Mr. POWERS. Yes; one-half, as I understand it.

Mr. McMILLIN. And the Government of the United States the other half?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. How are the employees of the library to be paid?

Mr. POWERS. All of the expenses are to be paid in the same way. The object of the amendment is to divide the expense.

Mr. McMILLIN. One moment more, if the gentleman will permit me. Is not the Congressional Library here open to all on certain conditions?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly; and if not, it is perfectly easy to fix it so it will be.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman will permit me just there, the hours during which the Congressional Library is open are not convenient for the working people of the District.

Mr. POWERS. Then change the hours.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is a subject of statutory regulation and can be changed by Congress.

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman will permit me one moment, I would like to ask if the Committee on the District of Columbia have submitted, with their favorable report to the House, any estimate of the expense they propose to involve the Government in for this building and the books?

Mr. POWERS. No, sir; the committee has not. They have been not only silent as to the size of the job they report, but have added nothing to what they reported on the 9th of March, when this question was previously before the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. On the subject of the other libraries in the city, I would ask the gentleman to state whether or not, in the different Departments of the Government, there are not now free circulating libraries for the benefit of the employees?

Mr. POWERS. I have already stated that. There are ample library accommodations for all of the employees, and not only that, but there are circulating libraries in the city where any person, by paying a small annual compensation, can have access to the books.

Now, the difference in the House, the difference between us, on this question arises from what is to be regarded as a proper application or construction of the phrase "municipal expense." Gentlemen say anything is a proper municipal expense that we can vote for the District of Columbia. The Fifty-first Congress decided that the establishment of a place to go in swimming was a proper municipal expenditure. If an association of young gentlemen here, wanted to establish a toboggan slide at the public expense and came to Congress, they could have it done under the definition that is given to the term "municipal expenditure" by some gentlemen upon the floor of this House.

Now, the question of a man's judgment as to what constitutes municipal expenditure depends altogether on the disposition of the man or on his opinion, some holding one thing and some another. It reminds me to a certain extent of a story I heard of an Irishman up in my State who was testifying in a controversy whether a certain Mr. A was drunk or not. Twenty witnesses had gone on the stand and sworn that A was drunk, but Pat, when he was put on the stand, swore him practically sober. They wanted to ascertain his method of determining the soberness of the man and asked him the question, "Pat, when do you think a man is drunk?" He replied, "I never think a man is drunk as long as he can lay on the ground and hang on to the grass." These gentlemen never think any expense is beyond the proper definition of a municipal expense as long as they can get votes enough in Congress to rush it through.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. What is the custom in the larger cities of the Union? Have they not established libraries at the public expense in Boston, Philadelphia, New York, and other large cities?

Mr. POWERS. Well, I will say——

Mr. ADAMS. I only ask this to get at what is the common practice in large cities.

Mr. POWERS. Undoubtedly that is so, and that is just what we are trying to have this city do—do it on its own money. The very question is a dead giveaway of the argument against this proposition, because these other cities have done it at their own expense. Let this city do it at its own expense.

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. PITNEY. In the great cities referred to, where public libraries exist, does the property of the United States of America contribute any part of the taxation for the support of those libraries?

Mr. POWERS. Not one cent.

Mr. GROUT. Are those cities capital cities, and have the United States agreed to contribute, as they have here? That answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. POWERS. That answers it very feebly.

Mr. GROUT. Very fully.

Mr. POWERS. Now, the argument that has been made outside of this House, and that I suppose will be adopted in this House, is that the National Government ought to have the benefit of this expense, because they say that the District of Columbia contributes so largely to the internal-revenue taxes. One of these papers, when I had the honor to receive a little attention from it a few days ago, stated that the whole State of Vermont did not pay so much in internal-revenue taxes as one-twelfth of what is paid by the District of Columbia. I was very glad that that proposition was advanced. Now, what do internal-revenue taxes come from? They come from rum and tobacco; and the highest compliment that that paper could have paid my own State was to call attention to the fact that it was a State with an hundred thousand more people than this city, and that that whole State pays less than one-twelfth as much for the privilege of selling rum as this city pays. There is where the fallacy of that argument rests.

Now, get beyond the matter of national taxation and take up local taxation. What is the fact about that? Why, Mr. Speaker, there is hardly a town in the State of Vermont but that pays nearly double the tax for the support of local institutions and local affairs that is paid by the people of this District. What becomes, then, of the argument that, because they sell more rum in Washington, because they have more rum shops in Washington than they have elsewhere probably on the face of the earth, and from that source they pay money into the national Treasury, that therefore our people should be asked to contribute to the maintenance of a public library here? The people of Vermont are not ambitious to enter into a race with the District of Columbia on the amount of rum tax that they shall pay to the General Government.

There are many more things that, if I had the time, I should be glad to review, but the question addresses itself in a practical way to the members of this House in another aspect. How are we situated? The Government of the United States, that is asked to incur one-half of this expense, is to-day borrowing money to pay its ordinary necessary expenses. Every member on the floor of this House has been told, "You can have no appropriation for a public building in your State; you can have no improvements of rivers and harbors; you can have nothing that your people at home want, for the simple reason that there is no money in the Treasury with which to pay it." And still the District of Columbia comes up, in the face of that statement, and says: "Give us our appropriation for the establishment of a library, for which there is no need, and ignore your own constituents at home." I want to appeal to gentlemen who have these local interests at home to tell me how they will answer the demands of their people: "Why did you not get this for us, and why did you not vote for it?" If you say, "The Government is borrowing money to pay its expenses," they will reply, "But you went down there and voted for a proposition that means an expenditure of millions from the public Treasury for the benefit of the people of the District of Columbia, and neglected your own people at home." If the members of this House can justify that at home, I am willing they should undertake the job. For me, I never will attempt it.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BARRETT in the chair). The gentleman from Vermont has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] controls the time. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. McRAE. I assume that I have a right to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask how this bill gets here, if it has been ordered into conference? This is not a conference report.

Mr. POWERS. If the Chair will allow me, I will state the status of the bill, but I do not wish it to come out of my time. This is a Senate bill which passed the Senate and was sent to the House. The House put on an amendment providing that the expenses in the bill should be chargeable to the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. McRAE. I understand that.

Mr. POWERS. The Senate asks for a conference. The House, instead of granting the conference, referred the bill back to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and they reported it back recommending that the House recede. Now, that may be parliamentary, but the proper way would have been to have had a conference committee appointed, and that conference committee made up of the friends of that amendment, and not its enemies. This bill comes from this committee now right back into the hands of the enemies of this amendment.

Mr. McRAE. Then do I understand——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. BABCOCK. Not out of my time.

Mr. McMILLIN. A parliamentary inquiry is always in order, and does not come out of any gentleman's time.

Mr. McRAE. I understand that; but the Chair seems to think differently. I stated in the beginning that I desired to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. Will the Chair hear my parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state that under the arrangement made, that there should be two hours for debate on this bill, with one hour to gentlemen on either side, the gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to the time. No member has the right, as a matter of right, to interrupt another who has the floor to interject a parliamentary inquiry. If the gentleman from Wisconsin is not proceeding in order, it will be in order to call him to order.

Mr. McRAE. I do not want to interfere with the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin, but I think the House ought to understand how it comes here. Why, then, can not the Chair, since the question is submitted, determine whether it is properly before the House or not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Arkansas should raise the point of order that the bill was not properly before the House, the Chair would be obliged to rule on that question, but unless he does so the Chair will not delay the proceedings of the House by a discussion of how this bill is now before the House. The time to have raised that issue was when the bill was taken up, and not now.

Mr. McRAE. But until I can understand the status of the bill I can not make the point; and that is why I made the parliamentary inquiry. I wanted to ascertain the status of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is altogether unusual after a bill has been under debate for two hours to ask whether it is properly before the House.

Mr. McRAE. But that is no more unusual than this proceeding, which gives this measure a status it never had.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. The gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I suppose if the House recede it passes the bill. That is all I want to say about that point.

Now, then, as to what constitutes a municipal expense, I do not think it necessary to consume much time in discussing. In my judgment the establishment of a free library is a legitimate municipal expense. I think it is beyond the domain of controversy. In all the States, so far as I know or believe, and some of the cities this expenditure has been made and sustained. It is so in my own State. In my own town, of 20,000 people, for ten years we have had a free library, bought and sustained by the municipality, and so it is generally throughout the country. So much for that. As to the free bath house, that is not before the House for discussion. In my judgment, in cities of the size of Washington, and larger, it is a proper municipal expense; but if that comes before us, having been entered upon, it is time enough to discuss that. As to the public library, the only question is whether it is needed, and if it be needed, whether, in the condition of the District and Federal revenues, the expenditure should be made; but the gentleman says the Library of Congress can be used. It can not be used properly and practically for the whole population of the District. If it was, it would not be there for use by Congress, or for the purposes for which it was established.

Now, I helped to defeat at one time a proposition to establish a free library in Washington. It came here a year or two ago with a proposition that it be housed in a public building about to be completed—the new post-office building. I did not believe that that building ought to be diverted to such a purpose. I opposed it and the House put its veto upon it, and it was not done. It is proposed to provide quarters for the free library as the other expenses of the District of Columbia are appropriated for, payable half and half. I think it is a proper municipal expense, and I believe that the bill ought to pass. Therefore I shall vote for it. I have not been swift, let me say, to relieve the District from proper taxation. I have stood here and contended, Congress after Congress, and generally successfully, to make this District do its share under the legislation of 1878. The establishment and maintenance of the Zoo, which was sought to be fastened on the Federal Government, in the end was fastened upon the revenues of the District and the revenues of the General Government, half and half.

Now, it may be possible that no library at all should be established. If so, well and good; let us lay this bill upon the table and there end it. I should regret to see that action taken, because, with 200,000 people, the mass of them not clerks in the Departments, most of them not capitalists, most of them laboring people, I believe in this great capital city they should have the same facilities for a free library that they have in my own city of 20,000, and that they have in cities of this size throughout the country; but I say again, if it is entered upon and is necessary, as I believe it to be, it is fair and proper, in my judgment, that it should be paid for as other municipal expenses are paid. And let me say to gentlemen, with all the social influence that surrounds Washington, that if we have heretofore, do now, and shall hereafter keep the expenditures to care for the District of Columbia as the act of 1878 provides, namely, half and half, we will have done very well and will be subject to congratulations among ourselves and also receive the approval of the people at large. Let us pitch the fight along the right line. It will come a little later, when the bill to build a memorial bridge is brought up, if you bring it up. That is to be built, as the Senate passed it, exclusively out of the Treasury of the United States. When it comes, as other measures will come, I am quite willing to stand by the act of 1878.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HULICK. I supposed I should have more time than the gentleman has assigned to me. When this bill was before the committee originally I favored entailing upon the District of Columbia all the expenditure connected with the establishment of this library. The bill went to the Senate, where it was amended so that the expenses of the maintenance of the library, including salaries of employees, shall be paid equally by the District of Columbia and the United States, and it has come back to us for consideration at this time. I shall vote for the bill as it comes to us amended, believing that this case should not be made an exception to the general rule of dividing these expenditures evenly between the District of Columbia and the United States public Treasury. There are many things connected with appropriations for this city and for the District that I think should be taken out of the operation of the rule established by the act of 1878, but I do not believe that we ought to begin with a public library. I presume there is not a member upon this floor who is not in favor of a public library and of the provisions contained in this bill for its maintenance.

The only question that is raised in the minds of members is, Shall the Government pay one-half or any portion of the expense of this library? That question is brought here, and, as I have said, I have come to the conclusion that we ought not to take this object out of the operation of the general rule; but at the same time I want to say in the hearing of this House that since I have been a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia I have learned some things which justify me in saying to the citizens of this District that they are themselves responsible for the feeling that has been expressed by members of this body against charging any part of this proposed expenditure to the General Government. They are responsible for that sentiment because of the manner in which taxes are levied and collected here in the District of Columbia. In regard to the present bill, as I have said, I believe we ought to pass it in its amended form. There are representatives here from all parts of the country. There are many here in the several Departments of the Government from my own county, from my own district, from my own State; and the same is true of every other district represented on this floor, and we ought to be willing to give these people the benefit of this free circulating library, and I believe that the General Government should pay one-half the expense of establishing it and keeping it up.

But, Mr. Speaker, turning now to the question of taxation in this District, the act of 1878 was passed upon the theory that the Government of the United States owned at least one-half of all the property in this city and District, so that in equity the Government ought to pay one-half of the expenses, the citizens of the District paying the other half. I do not believe the Government owns one-half in value of all the property in the District of Columbia. I find from the report of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the last year that in the city of Washington and the District of Columbia the real-estate assessment amounts to $188,922,343. To be more specific and exact, I will incorporate in my remarks the figures from the report of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia which show the assessed value of taxable real estate and personal property in the District of Columbia on July 1, 1895:

Washington City:
Taxable on land	$90,942,586
Taxable on improvements	74,457,233
		$165,399,819
Outside of Washington City:
Taxable on land at $1.50	11,613,660
Taxable on improvements at $1.50	5,502,500
		17,116,160
Taxable on land at $1	5,396,764
Taxable on improvements at $1	1,009,600
		6,406,364
Total assessed value of taxable real estate		188,922,343
Personal property:
Washington City	10,585,364
Washington County	46,985
Railroads, taxed on gross receipts	339,388
		10,971,737

Now, compare the personal-property returns. In the city of Washington and the District of Columbia there is reported only a little over $10,000,000—$10,971,737 of personal property. On yesterday the question of taxation was up before the committee, and some of these local corporations were insisting upon certain advantages in legislation because of the taxes that they paid into the city treasury, and in the course of inquiry there it was announced that the capitalists of this District did not pay taxes upon their chattel property; even the gentleman who was addressing the committee said that he did not pay a dollar of such taxes upon his stock in a certain corporation then under consideration. Furthermore, a gentleman of this city, a good lawyer, a good citizen, a man of integrity, a man who knew what he was talking about, on another occasion before our committee, said that there were large wholesale and retail establishments located here which paid not one dollar of personal tax.

Now, as I have said, it was by comparing the value of the taxable property in this District owned by the United States with the taxable property owned by the citizens that the scheme of having each pay half of the local expenditures was carried through, and, in view of the figures I have cited, it seems to me that there should be a change in the laws of the District in that respect; and a reassessment of the property, real, personal, and mixed, belonging to the District and to the Government, respectively, so that the proper rates of taxation should be adjusted in principles of equity—so amend the District tax laws that all property shall be justly and honestly placed on the tax duplicate; then a proper ratio can be established for taxation between the District and the Government.

Mr. Speaker, only ten millions of personal property on the tax duplicate of the District of Columbia? Why, a hundred millions would not cover the amount. Let there be reform in this respect, and very much of this opposition to the Government paying an equitable part of the expenses of the District will disappear.

Mr. Speaker, the bonded debt of the District amounts to about $18,000,000, drawing high rate of interest. That great debt must be paid some time in the future, by somebody. All the contemplated improvements of this great, beautiful city must be provided for, and all the property, real and personal, in the District should be subject to taxation. As it is now people come into the District with their money, stocks, and bonds to escape taxation. How long shall this state of affairs exist?

But as to changing the rule of taxation in the division of taxes I do not think we should begin the change at this point, or upon this bill for the establishment of a public library. There can be no better appropriation of the funds of the United States than for an object of this kind. Such a library will be of incalculable advantage to the clerks in the various Departments of the Government, to our families and friends who reside here, and to all the citizens of this District, and if you are going to make a change in the rule of taxation and of division of burdens I pray you begin not now upon this laudable measure. And to my friend from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], who advocates his side of the case so clearly and so well, I say: I pray you think for a moment before you insist upon making this library an exception to the general rule which has so long prevailed. If you were to express your honest sentiments here I believe you would say that you are in favor of this circulating library. You can not justify yourself for voting any other appropriation as easily as you can for voting this one for the establishment of a free circulating library for the benefit of all the people of this District and of the people of the United States who come here. Therefore, let us adopt this measure. Let us have this free circulating library established, but at the same time let the opposition which this bill has aroused here, coming as it does upon a measure which offers the least reason to excite such opposition—let that opposition, let the expression of sentiment here, be an intimation and a warning to the people of this District that unless they are willing to be taxed properly and to bear their just proportion of the burdens of the local government, the matter will be investigated and a new arrangement in the near future will be inevitable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POWERS. Does the gentleman think that it is an opportune time to incur this expenditure when the Government is borrowing money to pay its ordinary expenses?

Mr. HULICK. No. If we were now inaugurating this system, as it was inaugurated under the act of 1878, I would reply: "In view of the present condition of our Treasury I do not favor it." But for this laudable enterprise that will afford so many blessings to so many people, notwithstanding the sad condition of the Treasury, I favor this bill.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I will ask the gentleman whether there is any appropriation made by this bill.

Mr. HULICK. Not at all.

Mr. WELLINGTON. There is not one dollar nor one cent appropriated in the bill, and the gentleman from Vermont very well knows that.

Mr. DOCKERY. But there is a liability incurred.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Possibly.

Mr. TRACEY. Well, a liability is substantially the same as an appropriation.

Mr. WELLINGTON. But this bill makes no present appropriation, and that is what the gentleman is talking about; and the question is, whether there is going to be any considerable appropriation at any time.

Mr. HULICK. Well, in reply to that suggestion, I will say to the gentleman that the bill itself, in section 5, provides—

> That said library shall be located in some convenient place in the city of Washington, to be designated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia upon the recommendation of the trustees of said library: Provided, That in any municipal building to be hereafter erected in said District suitable provision shall be made for said library and reading room sufficient to accommodate not less than 100,000 volumes.

That would seem to indicate that there is to be an appropriation made hereafter.

Mr. POWERS. One more question. This library must cost something. Now, if you are going to have no money to establish it, what is the good of passing an act for that purpose?

Mr. HULICK. I have no doubt there will be an appropriation; and I favor any reasonable appropriation for the establishment of this library, whether the expenditure be for the construction of a building or for the maintenance of the library after the building is constructed.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman, as a member of the committee, kindly advise us as to the amount of the liability which will probably be assumed by the passage of this bill? Has the committee made any estimate of the probable cost of constructing the building and supplying it with a hundred thousand volumes?

Mr. HULICK. None whatever. The committee recognized the great importance of this measure, and they thought that the propriety of the establishment of this library would not be questioned by my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] or my friend from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], or by any other gentleman here. I trust that when the vote is taken these gentlemen will show that they are satisfied with the measure. The only question presented here is, whether the Government of the United States shall pay a part of this expense or whether the District shall pay the whole.

Mr. DOCKERY. And in determining that question, as the gentleman must see, it is material we should know what the expense is going to be.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Acting for the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] who controls the time in behalf of the pending motion, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT].

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, let us for a moment see what is the question before us, and how it comes here. The Senate passed a bill providing for a free circulating library in this District and dividing the expenses of this library equally between the District and the General Government, this being considered by the Senate a proper item of municipal expense. When that bill came up in the House for consideration, the House put upon it an amendment saddling the whole expense upon the District. When the bill went back to the Senate, that body nonconcurred in the amendment; a committee of conference was had; and now by the unanimous action of that committee of conference the House is asked to recede from its amendment and accept the bill as it originally came from the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Allow me to correct the gentleman. I believe this bill has never been in conference. We have taken in this case the extraordinary course of sending the bill back to the Committee on the District of Columbia after the Senate had asked for a conference.

Mr. GROUT. I was mistaken in saying that the bill went to a conference committee. When returned from the Senate, it went to the District Committee; and that committee decided that it would bring the bill before the House again on a motion that the House recede from its amendment. The question is now whether we shall insist upon that amendment or recede from it. The question really involved is whether the House will carry out in good faith the act of 1878—whether Congress will keep its word passed at that time. The agreement which Congress made in the act of 1878 was made on its own motion. The District did not ask it. Congress, without solicitation from the District, said that in the government of the District from that time forth the expenses of the municipal administration of the District, and of everything properly pertaining to municipal affairs, should be divided equally between the General Government and the District. The question is now, that obligation having been assumed by Congress, whether we shall keep faith. As I have said, the undertaking on the part of Congress was gratuitous; it was the solemn declaration of the legislative authority; the District had no voice in it. This is what Congress said they would do with the District, treating it simply as a child, because the people of the District have no voice in the Government any more than a child has a voice in the family government, except to appeal to the father, as the people of the District have the right to appeal to Congress. The question, I repeat, is whether we shall keep faith or whether we shall, by the amendment putting the whole expense of this library on the District, sneak away from this provision of law adopted in the act of 1878.

Now, let us examine for a moment and see why that arrangement adopted in 1878 was made. This city was laid out not by speculators, not by the people inhabiting the District, but by the General Government. I ask gentlemen to fasten their minds on that fact. The capital having been located here by the General Government, commissioners were appointed; and after procuring some land which was a forest they arranged that the whole extent of the city should be 6,111 acres, and they donated to the United States Government, for public streets and parks, 3,666 acres. There were to be granted to the General Government in building lots, to be sold by it, the money to go into the public Treasury, 10,136 lots, making 982 acres, and an equal number of lots went to the original proprietors. That was the trade which was made with the owners of the land. And then the United States bought for public buildings and parks 548 acres. This is the division which was made; the General Government took two-thirds of the land at that time and laid out a city to suit itself—not to suit any ordinary people, but in a way to make a magnificent capital of a great nation, and with this magnificence constantly in view laid out this city so that the sidewalks along the streets to-day are wider than the carriage ways in many of the great cities of the country. You will find the carriage way in many a street in New York City not so wide as the sidewalks of this city. This city was thus laid out on a scale so magnificent and extravagant that no mere municipality could ever half take care of it unassisted by the Government.

They did, however, provide a municipal government for the city and left it to local management, and up to 1878, and when the act was passed which divided the expenditures equally between the General Government and the people in the District of Columbia, the town was a mud hole, an absolute mud hole. The condition was anything but creditable to the American people whose capital it was, and the condition was constantly growing worse, and in 1878 had become so scandalous that the people of the United States, through their representatives in Congress, said something should be done; and they finally said, "We will divide the expense for the maintenance of the city, because no municipality can take charge of a city laid out on a scale so extravagant as this and pay all the expenses itself." They said, "Especially ought this to be done as the people of the District had nothing to do with laying it out; it was wholly the work of Congress. Besides the United States Government owns over one-half the taxable property of the District and ought for that reason to pay one-half of the expenses."

Now, if this provision of the act of 1878 is not right, if it should be changed, then bring in a bill and change it in direct and manly fashion, but do not seek to make the change in this indirect manner.

It is, Mr. Speaker, a principle of law with which all lawyers are familiar that you can not change a written contract by an attack upon it collaterally. It must stand until by direct proceedings you change it, no matter how inequitable it may be. But I deny that this relation between the District and General Government requires any change.

Now, confessedly, here is an item of public expenditure. Six hundred cities throughout the United States maintain libraries by municipal taxation. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked my colleague, the gentleman from Vermont, if certain other cities throughout the country did not maintain libraries as a municipal expense, the answer was, necessarily, that such was the case. Yes, said my colleague, in substance, the people of those cities bear the expense, and that is what we are trying to make the people here do. Now, who will say that the reply of my colleague was wholly fair, when it is kept in mind that in this city all municipal expenses are to be borne equally by the General Government and the District? Who fails to see that, when he admitted that a public library was an item of municipal expense generally throughout the country, he really gave away his whole case?

In the act of 1878 is a solemn agreement, a contract, to divide equally the expenses of this government, and it is a disgrace for Congress to undertake to wiggle out of it or crawl away from its obligations.

Now, the gentleman from Vermont said that the original understanding was that all proper and ordinary municipal expenses should be covered by the half-and-half arrangement. But that is not the language of the act. It is the "municipal expenses" of the District that are to be divided. But I claim a library is an ordinary and necessary municipal expense, is fairly and clearly so under any just construction. The gentleman brought in as an illustration the bathing-beach provision, which was passed some six years ago, and the gentleman claimed that that was an encroachment upon the rights of the General Government as far as the expenditure was concerned. But, Mr. Speaker, that appropriation is defensible on every ground of sound public policy. As he read from the report of the committee and during a large part of his speech undertook to ridicule it, it was perfectly clear to every fair-minded man on the floor that the people of this great city, with more than a quarter of a million inhabitants, are entitled to have a safe public bathing place. It is not only a provision in the sanitary interest of the public, but for the advancement of good morals as well. And when you preserve the health and morals of the public is it not a legitimate and proper subject of expenditure?

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROUT. If you will make it very brief.

Mr. POWERS. Do you regard the establishment of public bathing houses as a proper subject of municipal expenditure?

Mr. GROUT. I do, most emphatically.

Mr. POWERS. Then you think the Government ought to share in that expense?

Mr. GROUT. I do. They are sharing in it now. That was done six years ago. The gentleman is six years behind in his argument on the bathing beach, and he is more than six years behind on the question of this public library.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman pause in his argument long enough to read the bill which I hold in my hand, which came from his committee and which puts the whole of this expense on the District?

Mr. GROUT. We appropriate to-day, let me say to the gentleman, for the support of that bathing beach one-half from the public Treasury and one-half from the revenues of the District.

Mr. POWERS. If it is a proper subject of municipal expenditure, why did not you put one-half on the Government when you reported the bill?

Mr. GROUT. I do not know in what form the bill went through the House, nor do I know what bill the gentleman has. I have not seen it and can not stop to look at it.

Mr. POWERS. I am surprised that the gentleman does not understand the bills that he reported himself from his own committee.

Mr. GROUT. I do understand them, sir; the trouble is with the gentleman's understanding. Now, if the gentleman will allow me, I will proceed with my argument.

My colleague says that the Congressional Library is opened to the public. I say it is not, and to show who is right I will read a statement just received from Librarian Spofford, in the following words:

> No books can be drawn out except by Representatives or Senators, or their secretaries, and about 50 individuals and executive officers. The Library is not open after dark, and is not provided with gas or electric light.

This shows that the Congressional Library is wholly inaccessible except to such as visit it in the daytime and examine the books in the library room. No books are taken out by depositing value or by any persons except as above stated by Mr. Spofford; and, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY], if it were made a circulating library, which is impracticable, then the people of the District would be provided a library wholly at the expense of the United States instead of one-half, as proposed by this bill, and how could the gentleman stand that?

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON].

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I should not again trouble the House on this subject were it not for some expressions used by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS]. The gentleman from Vermont says that there is a job in this bill because in his answer to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] he said that the size of the job was not apparent; that it had not been stated.

I want to say to the gentleman from Vermont that there is no job in this bill. I make that statement in the first place. It is a proper bill, brought here by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I believe the members of that committee are as much entitled to credit for honesty as any of the members of this House. I want to say to the gentleman from Vermont that when he made that charge he very well knew there was no job in this bill. Gentlemen, you should divest this subject of all this sort of talk. Treat it fairly and squarely. What is this proposition?

In the first place, gentlemen admit that it is a proper thing to establish a free library in the District of Columbia. That is admitted by these very gentlemen. Now, further, if it is proper to establish a free library in the District of Columbia, then who should pay for it? We go a step further, and these gentlemen admit that it is proper for the municipal authorities to pay the current expenses of such a library. Further, then, if it is proper for a municipality to do that, then it is proper for this muncipality to do it. And how are the expenses of the municipality of Washington City met? Are they met entirely by the people of the District? No; they are met share and share alike by the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia. And upon this principle this library should be founded. I ask gentlemen to be fair about it. There is the whole thing in a nutshell. If it is proper to establish this library, it should be established upon the same principle that other public expenses are met. That is nothing more than fair and just.

Gentlemen talk about millions of dollars to be expended on this project. In this bill there is not one dollar pledged by this Government. It must come before the Committee on Appropriations before one dollar can be expended. When they speak of millions of dollars, do they not know that the bill itself recites the fact and the report recites the fact that the books are here to found it, that the books will be given us by the people of the District? Donations to the extent of $9,000 are already pledged to it, and many more will come in the future. Who can tell whether the Government will ever be called upon to give any extraordinary sum? This bill does not pledge the erection of a building for the use of the library. It merely pledges the establishment of the library, and pledges the paying of those who shall be there to conduct that library. That is all there is in this bill. I ask the members in this House to be fair about this matter and not to put it upon a false footing.

Mr. POWERS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MILNES].

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Speaker, as one of the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I am opposed to the House receding from the very proper amendment which, in my judgment, was made to this bill. I am in favor of the city of Washington having a free public library, but I am in favor of the citizens of Washington paying for the use of that library, just the same as my own city and every other city in the United States does. We are told, Mr. Speaker, that it is a question of keeping faith under the law of 1878. There never was a thing in that law that contemplated the building of a public library, half of the expense of which should be borne by the Government of the United States. It is not a necessary, legitimate municipal expense, nor is it so treated by cities generally in the United States of America. If you will look at the appendix to the report made by this committee, you will find there the different cities and how the libraries are supported; and in scarcely any case are they supported exclusively by regular taxes, but they are treated as special matters and supported by extraordinary or special taxes. It seems to me the committee have admitted this fact themselves when this bill was under consideration, and the gentleman who drew this bill must have so considered it, for they say—

> That the expenses of the maintenance of said library, including salaries of employees, shall be treated among the current municipal expenses of the said District.

If it was considered as a proper, legitimate municipal expense, it would not have been necessary to specify that it should be so treated.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it would not be burdensome for the citizens of Washington to pay for this public library. It has been shown upon this floor to-day that there is scarcely a dollar in taxes levied against the personal property of the city of Washington. In my judgment there is personal property to the amount of $150,000,000 that escapes assessment and taxation in this city. If they want to support this library, if they want to build a public library building, let us assess this personal property—as we do in our own cities—and pay for the library and its support out of the taxes so raised.

Mr. GROUT. If property escapes taxation here it is our fault, is it not?

Mr. MILNES. Yes; it is our fault.

Mr. GROUT. And the fault of nobody else?

Mr. MILNES. Yes; it is our fault, and it is a shame, too. But I say that there is $150,000,000 of personal property in the city of Washington that is not assessed and that does not pay a single cent of taxes, and that in all the other great cities of the country, in my State and your State, that property is assessed, and they could very well assess this property and support a public library.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does not the gentleman remember that the board of assessors of the District reported that over $10,000,000 was assessed for taxation here? That is somewhat different from not a dollar.

Mr. MILNES. But the gentleman will remember that that included railroads, franchises, and everything else. The chairman of the committee will remember that the question has been asked when in the committee a dozen times, and we have been told every time that personal property was not assessed at all in the District of Columbia. There is not a city in the United States of the magnitude or anything near the size of the city of Washington that does not pay from two to three times as much taxes as the citizens of Washington do; and therefore I say they should be called upon to pay these extraordinary expenses. Let them have leave to tax themselves on their personal property and pay for the library.

Mr. POWERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY].

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, the act of 1878 has been frequently invoked during this discussion as an argument why we should pass this bill without the amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS]. It is argued that under that act Congress entered into partnership with the District whereby it agreed to pay one-half of the municipal expenses. Concede that. What are municipal expenses? They consist of debts incurred under the authority of the charter of that municipality. At the time that the act of 1878 was passed the expense of a free public library was not a municipal expense, because the powers of the District had no power to establish a public library.

Now, I do not deny that a free public library is a proper subject for municipal expense, if the conditions be ripe, any more than a piano in a man's house is the proper part of the furnishing of that house, provided he is able to buy it and pay for it. I do not deny that an elegant carriage for the farmer or mechanic to ride from his home to church on a Sunday morning is a proper and economical expenditure, if the man can afford it; but if he can not afford it, it is an unwise and extravagant expenditure.

Now, under that act of 1878 Congress did not agree to pay one-half of all the bills that the District might make, of all bills of every character. Gentlemen who will refer to the act, as I have done, will find that after the estimates for expenditures are made up by the District Commissioners annually they must be laid before the Secretary of the Treasury. He scrutinizes them and strikes out whatever he thinks ought not to be there. Then he submits that to Congress. Then Congress, by its proper committees, scrutinizes all these estimates; and in that very act reserves the power to refuse any estimate that it does not approve of that is returned by the District Commissioners. So that, even in the matter of paving, in the matter of water, and in the matter of lights, Congress expressly reserves to itself in that act the right to refuse, and retains the right to finally pass upon the propriety of every expenditure they are authorized to make.

Now, sir, the population of the city of Washington is made up of three classes of people. Much the larger class are those who are employees of the Government, paid by the Government. Second, those who are here engaged in business making money out of the employees of the Government. Third, those birds of passage who, with accumulated fortunes, can afford to do as the wild goose does, choose their own location and have a pleasant season and a pleasant time and the enjoyment of life. [Laughter.] These three classes make up the population of this District. The first two classes live on dollars that come out of the Treasury of the United States; the latter class lives upon its accumulated fortunes. Now, sir, within the past three years, all over the United States, in town, in city, in village, and in country, the wages of every man that works for wages has been cut in two. The man at whose fireside plenty sat three years ago has poverty for a companion now. Has there been any change in the receipts of the employees of the Government——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POWERS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Syeaker, I am opposed to the pending motion made in the name of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to recede from the amendment of the House to the Senate library bill. First, be cause I believe the amendment to be a just and proper one; and second, because of the extraordinary method adopted to get rid of it. We adopted the amendment after considerable discussion in this House. Under the leadership of the able gentleman from Vermont the House agreed to the amendment. Deliberately and cautiously the House has said that while it wants a free library for the p ople of this District, it will insist that the appropriation here, which is to be the basis for the establishment of it, shall be taken from the revenues of the District and not from the people at large.

The Senate mildly suggests that they do not agree to the amendment, and ask for a conference. This bill was referred to a committee whose judgment upon this question has been repudiated by this House; and yet without any effort on its part and without any suggestion on the part of the House that it desired to recede, the committee comes back and recommends it and in some unaccountable way the bill gets before the House. I do not understand how under the rules it became privileged, but it is here, and we are told that it is now too late to prevent its consideration. The question, then, is whether you will deny the request made by the Senate for a conference, and thereby say to that body that we will not confer, and at the same time defy the expressed and known wish of the House, which has deliberately said to this committee we want this bill in the shape we returned it to the Senate.

It is a righteous amendment, one that ought to be adopted; and I want to say to the gentlemen who are pressing these unreasonable appropriations for free libraries, private colleges, and charitable institutions in the District of Columbia, to be paid for in part by the people in the States, if you do not stop in your mad career in this direction you will wake up some fine morning to find that the partnership which you suppose exists between this District and the Government of the United States is dissolved. The people of the country will not stand this character of appropriations unless the people of the District pay for them. The original contract was unjust to the United States at large, and yet it did not contemplate any items of expense like these. If you intend to compel the people of the entire country to contribute to the payment of one-half of the expense of every good public or private enterprise that the good people in this District may suggest, they will rise up and condemn it and put an end to it, as they ought to do. I believe we ought to draw the line upon the pending proposition and let the District understand that they can have a free library when they will pay for it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER].

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It affords me peculiar pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to speak a word in advocacy of this bill. The House well understands my unalterable opposition to the expenditure of public money for any private purpose. I am, however, and always have been a friend of education—in favor of its extension to the masses of the people in every possible well-considered manner.

Mr. POWERS. Would the gentleman be in favor of extending education to the extent of establishing colleges, one-half the expense of which should be paid by the General Government?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I am in favor of founding and maintaining a great national university, which shall be public and open to all the people. [Applause.] I have always stood in favor of that principle. I am not in favor of appropriating a single dollar of public money to private purposes, but, being in favor of education, I know from personal experience and from reasoning that you can not expend money in any way which would be more effective in advancing the cause of real education than by establishing a free reading library open to all the people of a community. We recognize that principle in our States, in our counties, in our cities, in our villages, and we gauge the civilization of a community by taking note of the manner in which it diffuses and distributes education among its people. That being the case, I can see no reason why gentlemen should hesitate and withhold their support from this righteous measure. It has been suggested that there are classes in this city who do not need this extension of our public school system. That may be, Mr. Speaker; but the great masses do need it. It can do no possible harm. It will do much good. I see in the galleries to-day, and when gentlemen go out on the streets they see everywhere, men and women and boys and girls who need it, and who are entitled to be carefully provided for in any educational measure that we may frame.

This is a wise measure. Vote for it. Vote for these public institutions which extend the light of a liberal education throughout the length and breadth of this land. By so doing you wisely use public money for the highest of public purposes and remove the last vestige of excuse, too often here offered by the friends of private institutions, who for private gain seek to take money out of the public Treasury.

Education is in every civilized country recognized as peculiarly a fit matter of public control, guidance, and care.

As you foster and diffuse it you raise the standard of citizenship.

If it is a matter of public concern it is exceedingly ungenerous, to say the least, to avoid our due share of the expense.

Concede, as we must, that this is a proper matter of municipal expenditure, it is our duty to meet it.

This is our capital city. It should in all its appointments fitly typify our nation, its progress and its intelligence. This should be a center of culture, where the lowliest may have access to the best of books and Washington be the pride of our people and the worthy pattern city of the land.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] spent the greater part of his time in endeavoring to show that a bill which was passed here about six years ago was not a proper measure. He made a windmill out of the bathing-beach bill and ridiculed the idea of public cleanliness. That law is 6 years old, and the gentleman from Vermont has apparently just found it out. In my judgment the opposition to a public free circulating library in a great national capital like this places the opponent more than six years behind the great procession of intelligence and wisdom and progress. What had the question of the bathing-beach bill to do with the question we have here? Suppose that legislation was wrong, which it was not, how does that affect this matter? I would vote to enlarge the capacity of that bathing beach, and if the gentleman from Vermont will leave the suburban, the Arcadian, the remote locality from which he comes and travel over the civilized world he will learn that it is a part of the duty of every considerable municipal corporation to afford bathing facilities for its people. The gentleman talks about that legislation here as though it were a monstrous thing. Go to the cities of Europe—you need not go to Europe—go to the cities of our own country, and you will find everywhere that one of the most striking developments of the civilization of this time is furnishing to the masses of the people, under the protection of municipal regulation, facilities for bathing.

The first question to be decided here is whether this public library is a proper subject of municipal expenditure. The gentleman from Michigan tells the House that it is not. Why, sir, he ought to know, and he certainly does know, that the magnificent State which he in part so ably represents stands upon soil covered and dedicated by the great Ordinance of 1787, which declared in language that has since been a beacon light to all the world that "religion, morality, and education are essential to the prosperity of a State." And from that day to this in those five magnificent States that doctrine, organic and fundamental as it was, has been carried into operation in all the statutes and all the ordinances of those States and their cities. His own city of Detroit expended last year $52,000, every dollar of which was drawn directly or indirectly from municipal taxation, to maintain and carry on a free public library. Part of the money came, of course, from the fines which otherwise would have gone into the public treasury. And so it is from one end of our country to the other. The progress of a State, the intelligence of a people, are marked by these magnificent milestones, public libraries for the people of the country. [Applause.] Show me a State that has none of these public libraries, and I will show you a State whose farms are being abandoned by the population or whose people are so far in the wilderness that civilization has not reached them. This question of education, with libraries as an adjunct of education, is the test, the touchstone of progress.

Now, here we are in the city of Washington, the capital of this magnificent nation of ours—a nation that undertakes to set the pace for the civilization of the world, that undertakes to lead in all that is becoming a state. We have here a city beautiful in comparison with any other city on earth—a city that is the pride and boast of every American citizen. No citizen of this country goes abroad and travels beneath the folds of the flags of other nations without feeling instinctively his national pride aroused by the recollection of his own flag and his own capital city of Washington. And, sir, when was any American citizen ever criticised for having voted to carry on works of art, works of education, works for the development of civilization in this city of Washington?

We ought to have here a model city, a city that would be a model in municipal government, a model in the matter of municipal expenditure, a model in the matter of her laws, her ordinances, her administration—a model city that every American could justly and wisely be proud of. Sir, you may bring a man here from Montana (and they have public libraries there); you may bring a man from the Dakotas (and they have public libraries there); you may bring a foreigner here from any of the civilized cities of the Old World (and they have public libraries there). Suppose, when we have congregated here citizens from the great cities of the country and the world, the American, proud of his birth and his country, is cross-examined by a citizen of the Old World and asked, "What have you done for the masses of your people in the matter of education? Where are your public libraries?" Must that citizen say in reply, "Nowhere; the great National Government enthroned at the great capital city has no library for the masses of her people." Is a city of 300,000, a growing city, the pride of the Republic, to be dealt with upon the old wooden mold-board proposition that an expenditure of this character is not a proper subject of municipal government? If I did not know better, I should be inclined to follow back upon his tracks a gentleman who would utter such sentiments as that, and should expect to find him using the old Dillingworth spelling book in his schools and the wooden mold-board plow in his fields.

It is said we have a public library here. Sir, I hold in my hand the rules of the Congressional Library. In the brief time I have I can not stop to read them; but I say to the House—and I think every gentleman here knows it—that that Library is in no sense a public library; and if it ever becomes a public library its present high purpose will have been abandoned and destroyed. You can not send the books of that Library out among the masses of the people; you can not send out those pamphlets, those maps; you can not admit the representatives of 300,000 people of this District into this building across here and allow them to carry away the books of the Congressional Library.

The Congressional Library is unique in its construction, unique in its organization—unlike a public library in every essential sense. It is a Library for the keeping, the preservation, the perfect order and regulation of the books and documents deposited there. It can not be made a circulating library for the benefit of the masses of the people without destroying its original purpose and bringing it down from the high plane upon which it has been proposed to keep it.

It has been suggested that there is no appropriation in this bill, and on the subject of the appropriation one gentleman has appealed to what, in my judgment, is not quite a high-toned and dignified argument—that some of you have not had your waterways improved as much as you would like and therefore you must not vote for this bill; you have not had your public buildings constructed——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will proceed. There are three minutes remaining.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is urged that some gentlemen have not secured the river and harbor improvements that they desired and that the public buildings they were interested in have not been constructed. Sir, we look forward with great confidence to the dawn of the day when this mighty nation shall have money enough to appropriate for all purposes incident to a great National Government. And because in the stress of our present condition we have been rightfully economical in our administration, yet there is no proper argument that appeals to a member of Congress to fail to put into motion the preliminary steps to the construction of this library, which is all that is involved in the pending question.

Gentlemen, I appeal to the members of this House who have intelligently, wisely, and fearlessly acted heretofore, to stand forth now in behalf of the glory of your country, in behalf of the dignity of your nation, and in behalf of those people here whose sole opportunity for education in this direction lies through the channel which this bill will open to them. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on receding from the House amendment.

Mr. POWERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POWERS. There seems to be some misunderstanding as to the status of this motion. This bill was a Senate bill, which provided that the expense should be divided between the District and the Government generally. The House put on an amendment providing that the whole expense was to be paid by the District. This motion, I understand, is that the House shall recede from its own action?

The SPEAKER. To recede from its action.

Mr. POWERS. Then those in favor of having these people pay for it will vote "no."

The question was taken. Before the announcement of the vote,

Mr. POWERS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 113, nays 127, not voting 114; as follows:

So the motion was rejected.

The following pairs were announced until further notice:

Mr. WATSON of Indiana with Mr. WILSON of South Carolina.

Mr. RANEY with Mr. COWEN.

Mr. DRAPER with Mr. TUCKER.

Mr. ANDREWS with Mr. MILES.

Mr. CROWTHER with Mr. LAYTON.

Mr. MILLER of West Virginia with Mr. WOODARD.

Mr. HEMENWAY with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. TRACEWELL with Mr. HENDRICK.

Mr. LORIMER with Mr. HUTCHESON.

Mr. WHITE with Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. RUSK.

Mr. TAWNEY with Mr. DOWNING.

Mr. MCCLURE with Mr. MINER of New York.

Mr. MCCORMICK with Mr. HALL.

Mr. GAMBLE with Mr. CLARKE of Alabama.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. PRICE.

Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. COBB of Alabama.

Mr. HULICK with Mr. COX.

Mr. WANGER with Mr. WASHINGTON.

Mr. DAYTON with Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi.

Mr. CORLISS with Mr. CUMMINGS.

Mr. DOLLIVER with Mr. FITZGERALD.

Mr. BROSIUS with Mr. SPENCER.

Mr. DALZELL with Mr. CRISP.

The following pair was announced for this vote.

Mr. DINGLEY with Mr. STALLINGS.

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Speaker, I am paired generally with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. COX. I am not prepared to say how he would vote on this question. If, however, there be any doubt, I will render it in favor of the pair and withdraw the vote.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I was in the Hall during the call of the roll, and desire to have my name entered.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening for his name?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I had both my ears open. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Unless the gentleman answers the question, of course the Chair does not see how he can entertain the request.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, I was talking to another gentleman. I was listening, but did not hear my name.

The SPEAKER. The rule is intended to prevent that.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Then I would rather lose my vote than violate the rule.

The SPEAKER. That is a sound principle. [Laughter.]

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. POWERS, a motion to reconsider the vote just taken was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The question now before the House is, Will the House agree to a further conference?

The question being submitted, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POWERS. This bill now goes to conference. This amendment to the Senate bill has been put there by the House twice. Now, I submit to the Chair that in the appointment of conferees the House should have on its conference committee a majority at least representing the sentiment of the majority of the House on this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take that matter into consideration.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR OF THE MINT.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] has a matter of public business, for the consideration of which he asks unanimous consent.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House concurrent resolution No. 30.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 additional copies of the report of the Director of the Mint for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 5,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Director of the Mint.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the last vote, and I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] moves to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to, and moves to lay the latter motion on the table. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I object to the unanimous consent asked by the gentleman from Iowa. The gentleman moved to reconsider and then to lay that motion on the table, and the Chair announced that in the absence of objection the latter motion would be agreed to. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to remind the gentleman from Iowa—and I am sure he did not intend to take any advantage of me—that I specially said to him that when this resolution was reported I should have something to say about the report of the Director of the Mint, and I understood the gentleman from Iowa to agree that I should have fair notice. Am I mistaken about that?

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman spoke to me one day coming up in the elevator and said that when that resolution was called up he proposed to say something about it. The gentleman was in the Hall of the House when this report was presented. He offered no observations, and I presumed that possibly he had reconsidered his intention. He had ample opportunity.

Mr. BAILEY. I was not immediately in the Hall of the House until the resolution had been reported and adopted. I said to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] who represents the minority on that Committee on Public Printing, that I desired to say something about it, and I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] will permit the motion to reconsider to remain pending.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman will excuse me, the observation was casually made, as I have remarked. The gentleman did not intimate to me whether he was in favor of or in opposition to the resolution. I had no notice that he desired to oppose the resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. There are some misstatements made by the Director of the Mint to which I think attention should be called. There is an effort at elaborate argument——

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, is this debate in order?

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to know if the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw the motion to table, and permit the motion to reconsider to remain pending? Whenever it suits his convenience to call it up I shall desire to say something about the report of the Director of the Mint.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will allow me to make a statement, inasmuch as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has referred to me. He did mention the matter to me and stated that he desired to be present when the resolution was considered. He also told me, as I remember, that he intended to make some comments upon the report. I did not know that my friend the chairman of the committee [Mr. PERKINS] was going to report the resolution, and I did not notice at the time that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] was not in his seat. I say that simply in justice to myself.

Mr. BAILEY. I was so sure that both of the gentlemen——

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman will permit me, I have no disposition whatever to cut off the gentleman. I am perfectly willing to agree to his suggestion, and he can make his observations, and then we will pass the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The motion which is now pending before the House is not a debatable motion unless a reconsideration actually takes place, in which case the debate can be had; but by unanimous consent the action of the House can be considered as rescinded, and then the gentleman can debate the matter.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will say to the gentleman that there are some other matters that have been arranged to come up, and I hope the time will not be taken now for that.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no disposition to interfere with any order of proceedings which has been agreed upon or which it is desired shall now take place. I have not even the report of the Director of the Mint here, and I had no thought, with the assurance of my friend from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] and the assurance of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], but that I should be given at least some little notice. I desire expressly to acquit my friend from Iowa——

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be placed in any false position here. There was no assurance given.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I put my word against his that he did tell me that I should have notice.

Mr. PERKINS. This observation was made: That he desired to make some observations on this resolution when it was submitted.

Mr. BAILEY. And did not the gentleman tell me that I should have notice?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. You did, and I will put my word against yours that you did.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that the motion to lay on the table and also a motion to reconsider stand over.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw any request that I made. I shall find some future occasion to say what I desire to say.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. Then, without objection, the motion to reconsider will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of the committees. The call rests with the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 6644) granting a pension to Gen. John M. Thayer, United States Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 1141) granting a pension to Miss Mary E. Hull, dependent sister of John A. Hull, deceased, late of Company F, Fifty-first Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the late war of the rebellion, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month;

A bill (H. R. 4053) repealing chapter 148 of the Supplement of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 5083) granting an increase of pension to A. H. McLaws.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 888) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company," approved March 2, 1892;

A bill (S. 1816) granting a pension to Eliza Craig Heckman, widow of Brig. Gen. Charles A. Heckman;

Joint resolution (S. R. 112) donating a condemned cannon and some shells to the Guilford Battle Ground Company, near Greensboro, N. C.;

A bill (S. 250) for the relief of W. H. L. Pepperell; and

A bill (S. 972) to provide for the continuance in office of customs officers and assistant treasurers until successors shall have been appointed and qualified.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 5672) to grant railroad companies in the Indian Territory additional powers to secure depot grounds; and

A bill (H. R. 5363) authorizing the construction of a fog signal on the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor, Wisconsin.

METRIC SYSTEM.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the committee to call up the bill (H. R. 7251) to fix the standard of weights and measures by the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the 1st day of July, 1898, all the Departments of the Government of the United States, in transaction of all business requiring the use of weight and measurement, except in completing the survey of the public lands, shall employ and use only the weights and measures of the metric system.

SEC. 2. That from and after the 1st day of January, 1901, the metric system of weights and measures shall be the only legal system of weights and measures recognized in the United States.

SEC. 3. That the metric system of weights and measures herein referred to is that in which the ultimate standard of mass or weight is the international kilogram of the International Bureau of Weights and Measures, established in accordance with the convention of May 20, 1875, and the ultimate standard of length is the international meter of the same bureau, the national prototypes of which are kilogram numbered 20 and meter numbered 27, preserved in the archives of the office of standard weights and measures.

SEC. 4. That the tables in the schedules annexed to the bill authorizing the use of the metric system of weights and measures passed July 28, 1866, shall be the tables of equivalents which may be lawfully used for computing, determining, and expressing the customary weights and measures in the weights and measures of the metric system.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill comes from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures with its unanimous indorsement. It is submitted as a substitute for the bill H. R. 2758, introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HURLEY]. It differs from that in no essential particular except in its mode of statement and in the time at which it shall go into operation. The purpose of the bill is simply to complete the work which was commenced in 1866.

By a provision of the Constitution, Congress is vested with the power to fix the standard of weights and measures. That was never done, and no systematic attempt has been made to do it except by the act of 1866. It is true that Washington in his first message to the First Congress called attention to the obligation resting upon them to perform that duty, and fix the standard of weights and measures. The injunction was repeated in subsequent messages. Jefferson submitted to Congress two proposed systems for their consideration, one decimal and another nondecimal. Madison reiterated the recommendation of Washington, and sought to impress upon Congress the necessity of performing that duty; but at that time the whole question of weights and measures throughout the world was in a state of uncertainty and confusion. France was striving to establish an international system. England was seeking, if possible, to make her system universal, and the whole world was in a sort of chaotic condition, so far as any agreement upon that subject was concerned. The Secretary of the Treasury, without a standard by which the weights of even the coins that came from our mints could be determined, sent to England and obtained an old troy pound, and Congress recognized this troy pound of Great Britain as the standard for use in the mints.

Beyond that, no action was taken until 1866 expressly recognizing any weight or any measure as standard. It is true that the Secretary of the Treasury, forced to adopt some system for determining the tax to be collected on imports, and to administer the impost system of the country, had to establish or to recognize some weights and measures. He therefore adopted the old English bushel—the Winchester bushel—and the old English gallon. The avoirdupois pound he derived from the old troy pound. The yard was drawn from the Troughton scale, obtained by Albert Gallatin at about the time he obtained the troy pound. Congress recognized these weights and measures to the extent of authorizing the distribution of standards thereof to the various States. These standards were then established and recognized simply by the Treasury Department. Beyond that nothing was done, and no systematic effort was made to do anything until 1866, when a unanimous report from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures recommended that the metric system be established and recognized as legal and permissive throughout the country. The metric system in the meantime had gone through the experimental stage, and had been recognized and adopted by most of the nations of Europe, by most of the nations of the Western Hemisphere, by some of the nations of Asia, and by some of the nations of Africa. That committee, by a unanimous recommendation, asked that the system be made permissive in this country. The House, by a unanimous vote, adopted the same view as their action. That action, however, did not make the system obligatory, but simply recognized it as a legal system permissive by anybody who desired to use it.

In the elaborate report presented by the chairman of the committee, the Hon. John A. Kasson, recommending the passage of that bill, the committee say:

> They do not doubt that a subsequent Congress will be prepared to go farther, and will enable the Republic to lead rather than to follow the action of other commercial and intelligent nations in the complete establishment of this most urgently demanded reform. It is an obligation which we owe not only to our present convenience, but also to posterity, to whose benefit all sound reforms invariably tend.

Later in their report they indicate the method by which they assume a subsequent Congress will act, and they say:

> The interest of trade among a people so quick as ours to receive and adopt a useful novelty will soon acquaint practical men with its convenience. When this is attained, a period, it is hoped, not distant, a further act of Congress can fix the date for its exclusive adoption as a legal system. At an earlier period it may be safely introduced into all public offices and for Government service.

Exactly according to the plan and the programme recommended by that committee, this bill is drawn. That such action has not been taken before is perhaps a little remarkable. It is true that the Coinage Committee, under the leadership of Alexander H. Stephens, presented two elaborate reports in subsequent years, recommending substantially this action, but during those years we were engaged, in common with other nations of the world, in establishing the International Bureau of Weights and Measures and perfecting, or rather perpetuating, the system. To the convention which established that bureau the name of the American minister stands first among the signatures. That bureau has been kept up by the contributions of this country and of the other countries from that time to this, and for years it was engaged in the careful investigation of the exact accuracy of the standards and in furnishing prototype copies to all the countries who were members of that bureau. Our copy came to us in 1890. About that period, by the authority of Congress, the President of the United States was authorized to call the international American conference, and one of the purposes for which that conference was invited was to consider the propriety of establishing a uniform system of weights and measures. That conference met in 1890, and by its unanimous action recommended to this nation to do what I believe every other nation taking part in the conference has or had done, namely, to adopt this international metric system. The present bill, then, proposes to do that. It proposes simply, as I have said, to do what the other American Republics and all the leading nations of the world, except Great Britain and Russia, have already done.

It proposes to establish this system, first for the operations of the Government, and then, at the commencement of the new century, to recognize it as the legal system throughout the country. It proposes to enforce its observance upon no one except the officers of the Government. It proposes to do that in accordance with the recommendation of those officers themselves. Beginning with Secretary of State Blaine, who transmitted the findings and the recommendation of the international conference, and who gave to the system his emphatic indorsement, the Secretaries of the Treasury and other Cabinet officers have recommended its adoption. In the last Congress, upon the motion of Mr. Wilson, then the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and now Postmaster-General, a resolution was adopted requesting that the Secretary of the Treasury, the Director of the Mint, and the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, who is, ex officio, superintendent of weights and measures, should investigate the propriety of the general and compulsory adoption of this system and report to Congress. By some clerical error that resolution did not reach those gentlemen. At the beginning of this Congress, or early in this session, the committee having under consideration this bill transmitted to those gentlemen a copy of that resolution which had been passed unanimously by the House of Representatives, and requested them, in accordance with its terms, to communicate to the committee their opinion as to the propriety of the measure. They complied with the request, and I have here the report, first of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle, and the Director of the Mint, Mr. Preston, saying:

Many advantages would accrue from the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures by the United States, by reason of its great simplicity and the facilities which are apparent on the examination of its complete decimal system, thus making a saving of time and labor in converting one denomination into another.

The further fact that the system has been adopted by nearly all the European countries and their colonies makes its adoption by the United States desirable.

The third member of the commission, appointed or sought to be appointed under the authority of the last Congress, General Duffield, the Chief of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, transmits his opinion in terms even more emphatic than the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is as follows:

I am decidedly in favor of the adoption by the United States Government of the metric system, and trust that favorable action may be taken by the present Congress.

The advantages of a decimal system are so many and obvious, and are so well known and universally recognized by scientific men and others, that no argument on the subject seems necessary.

* * * * * * *

The change once made, would soon commend itself to all, as the inconvenience arising from it would be of short duration and its advantage would soon become manifest.

* * * * * * *

I may add that the metric system has been used almost exclusively in the work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey for many years, and other scientific bureaus of the Government have also adopted it. It is also extensively used both in this country and Great Britain in scientific research, both by institutions and individuals. No time seems more propitious than the present for its adoption by Congress, and, as said before, after a fair trial the opposition to it would soon disappear.

Among the nations that have made the metric system compulsory may be named the following: France, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Servia, Roumania, Mexico, Brazil, Peru, Venezuela, and Argentine Republic.

In Great Britain, Japan, and the United States the system is legalized, but its use is not compulsory.

Russia and Denmark stand alone in not having taken any action, but even these countries are contributors to the International Bureau of Weights and Measures.

In many of the bureaus of the Government this system is now in operation. In the Coast and Geodetic Survey it has for years been practically the exclusive system. In other bureaus it is used to a large extent. In the Post-Office Department it is within the power of the Postmaster-General, even under existing law, to have every letter weighed by the metric system, and whenever a pound of mail matter, or an ounce of mail matter, is placed in the office for transportation to any foreign country, even to Great Britain, which has not the metric system, even to Russia, which has not the metric system, that mail matter is weighed by the metric system and its transportation settled by it.

The committee, thinking that the Post-Office Department was brought into close and constant communication with the people, and to a certain extent with the transactions of commerce, sought the opinion of the Postmaster-General in relation to the pending bill.

Mr. Wilson, the Postmaster-General, writes:

As the metric system now prevails in most of the leading nations of the world, I believe that the accession of the United States and Great Britain to the system is all that is needed to put it into general operation, and that such operation would greatly facilitate the commercial and financial intercourse of different countries, and give to each of these two countries a simplification of the present system of coinage, weights, and measures.

I see no reason to doubt that the metric system, gradually introduced, would operate successfully and advantageously in this Department.

The Secretary of Agriculture, who is brought close to large classes of people, who represents the farming interests throughout the nation, and who in recent years, since the efforts to extend the markets for the farm products of our nation, has been brought in contact with the systems of other countries, writes more emphatically than either of the other gentlemen, indorsing this measure and calling attention to the fact that in the publications of the Department relative to the extension of the market for American agricultural products he is obliged to print, and does print, upon the back of every one of the bulletins an explanation of the metric system:

This almost cosmopolitan use of a system of weights and measures totally different from that employed in the United States naturally places American merchants interested in foreign trade at a great disadvantage. Not only are American price lists confusing to the foreign merchant, owing to the different denominations used, and trade thus impeded, but the fact that foreign lists are made in terms equally unfamiliar to our merchants is said to result in unfair discriminations, and often in fraud.

In order to make the statistical publications of foreign countries fully intelligible to our people it is necessary to convert the terms of the metric system into our own weights and measures. This entails a vast amount of work which would be wholly avoided were the metric system in use in this country. The obstacles which have to be overcome in this regard have been brought to my attention by the work done in the section of foreign markets of this Department, an office which I created for the especial purpose of ascertaining the demands of foreign countries for American products. The work of this section, which consists chiefly in the handling of foreign statistics, would be immeasurably less difficult were our own weights and measures in uniformity to those of other countries.

In view of these difficulties, and recognizing the advantages of the metric system, I have directed that upon each of the bulletins issued by the section of foreign markets there be printed a diagram illustrative of this system, together with the proper equivalents.

* * * * * * *

I am heartily in favor of the proposed legislation, and trust that it may be enacted.

It was thought proper that the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior should be invited, more especially with reference to the application of this system to the Land Department. Responding to the communication of the committee, the Secretary of the Interior says:

For my own part I am disposed to question the advisability of adopting the system at all, for the reason that it would involve the abolition of a system of weights and measures which is interwoven into all the commercial transactions of the country.

Note the reason given. The Secretary of the Interior, who has no connection with commerce, bases his objection to the adoption of the system upon the theory that it would interfere with the commercial transactions of the country. Along with that communication, however, the Secretary of the Interior transmits the opinion of the Commissioner of the Land Office, of an entirely different character. I will read just a line or two from it:

The change from a complex and nondecimal system of units and measures to the simple and purely decimal system appears necessary to be effected, if the United States would keep in the front rank of progress with the other civilized nations of the earth, most of which have already adopted and utilized this reformed system.

The Secretary of the Interior objects to this system on account of its effects upon the commercial interests of the country; yet the Secretary of the Treasury who knows more of those interests and is brought more closely in contact with them, says that it is a judicious and proper measure. The Secretary of Agriculture, who has lately been dealing with the commercial interests of large classes of our people, says that this measure is absolutely necessary in order to promote and protect those commercial interests. The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, dealing largely with those questions that relate to foreign commerce, writes a letter in most emphatic terms approving the change, as follows:

I am strongly in favor of introducing the general use of the metric system of weights and measures in the commercial returns of the United States. Not only would it greatly simplify calculations of weights and quantities, but it would also render comparison with foreign returns a matter of no difficulty. All continental Europe uses this system in their trade publications, and anyone who has had occasion to use them will realize what an improvement the metric system is upon the system used in the publications of the United States. I see no objection to its introduction, and I see many advantages.

The Chief of the Bureau of American Republics, who is specially charged with the extension of the commercial interests of this country upon the Western Continent, writes at length upon this subject; and if there is time I will ask the Clerk to read what he says.

The Clerk read as follows:

The failure of the United States Government to adopt the metric system is one of the most inexplicable instances of false conservatism in the history of the country. In face of the fact that almost every civilized government has seen the necessity of a common system of weights and measures to facilitate the interchange of commodities, the people of the United States have persisted in retaining their old and cumbrous system, which might have served those who believed in nonintercourse with the outside world, but which stands as a barrier to that freedom of exchange to which the world is now tending. We send consular representatives to every quarter of the globe for the express purpose of making possible an extension of our foreign commerce, and then busy ourselves in an attempt to make such foreign commerce impossible, and retain a system of weights and measures which adds to our own difficulties and makes us mere barbarians to the more progressive nations.

* * * * * * *

In the publications of the Bureau, and especially in the regular monthly bulletins, it is found necessary to translate into three languages the equivalent expressions of measures of commodities and space, and even then we fail to give expression to terms which are fully understood in all parts of the countries composing the union. What this means of wasted labor in exchange is readily understood by all who have tried to read understandingly the reports published regarding the progress of different industries in the newer Republics of this continent, to which constantly increasing attention is being attracted.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. To this may be added the testimony of Chief Engineer Melville, of the Navy Department, whose profession has given him opportunities for personal observation in various parts of the world. He says:

There is no doubt that the adoption of the metric system would greatly benefit American manufacturers in every line. We are woefully behind the leading foreign countries in pushing our trade abroad, and I have been forcibly reminded of this fact whenever I have entered a foreign port.

The adoption of the metric system would do much to put our manufacturers on a par with those of Europe, and enable them to compete for the trade of nonmanufacturing countries. Our manufacturers know nothing of the metric system, while those of England and Germany print their price lists with dimensions, etc., expressed in both systems in parallel columns, although England has not yet formally adopted the decimal system.

The testimony of such witnesses ought to receive very serious and thoughtful attention. As corroborating them, I desire for a moment to call attention to some statistics as to the foreign commerce of this country with metric-using and nonmetric-using nations. I hold in my hand a tabular statement prepared by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, giving the commerce (imports and exports) of the United States with the several nations with which we trade. I will not undertake to detain the House by reading these statistics item by item; but let me call attention to the footings of the metric-using, the nonmetric-using, and the permissive nations, as they are termed, the latter embracing practically Great Britain and Japan.

	Population.	Imports.	Exports.	Total imports and exports.
Total obligatory metric system	254,318,820	$344,270,432	$277,224,066	$621,494,498
Total legalized	3,476,000	2,709,922	1,272,089	3,982,011
Total permissive	83,686,518	191,659,728	399,961,407	591,621,135
Total nonmetric	118,155,901	12,626,393	15,283,403	27,909,796

It will thus be seen that our trade with the metric-using nations amounted last year to more than $621,000,000, more than one-half of the entire commerce of the United States; that with the nonmetric using nations the amount was $27,000,000——

Mr. DINGLEY. As I understand the gentleman, all the commercial countries of the world except Russia, Great Britain, and the United States are using the metric system.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. All the countries of the world of any size except Russia, the United States, and Great Britain, to which I may add Denmark. Denmark is peculiarly situated; surrounded by metric-using nations and using metric terms herself in practical life; yet, as a matter of legislation, she has not adopted the system but is likely to do so within the year.

Mr. DINGLEY. This bill proposes that the Government of the United States adopt the metric system in the transaction of its business on July 1, 1898——

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. And that it be made lawful for the whole country——

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. That it shall be the legal standard throughout the country on the 1st of January, 1901, the beginning of the new century. That is the proposition of the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. And this system, now proposed to be adopted, is practically the application of the decimal system, which now applies to our coinage, to our weights and measures as well?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. It is a decimal system of weights and measures. We have the decimal system, and have had it ever since the early history of the country, in reference to our coinage. This is a proposition to apply the decimal system to length, capacity, and weight. That decimal system is an international system, being used in common by all the nations, which have combined together to keep the standards at a point near Paris, a place the neutrality of which is guaranteed by all the nations who are parties to the agreement, and from which point prototype standards are sent out to all of the nations using that system.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman be kind enough to inform the House—for that is a practical point; there is no doubt of the value of the decimal system—but will he be kind enough to inform the House with reference to what is claimed to be the confusion that would arise from the change. In other words, is there anything in the metric system that may not be learned by a child inside of a half hour?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Nothing whatever.

Mr. HOPKINS. How is it with a man who has already learned the other system?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. No difficulty at all.

If you will allow me I will complete the tabular statement about which I was talking, and then I will recur to the question of the gentleman from Maine later on.

Completing this tabular statement as to the commerce of these countries, it is only fair to say that five hundred and ninety-one millions of our commerce are with the permissive using nations; that is to say, largely with Great Britain and three or four other smaller nations, which use this system or not as the people may see proper. But the commerce with Great Britain, which forms the bulk of the $591,000,000, mark you, is, much of it, to be converted into other denominations. We have not, for instance, the same bushel or the same gallon. Our commerce is largely in selling to Great Britain our wheat, and that is measured in this country by one bushel, and by another in Great Britain. It is largely in selling to Great Britain our oil; which is measured by one gallon here and a different gallon in Great Britain. We have, in other words, in use in this country what is known as the old Winchester bushel and the old English gallon, which Great Britain discarded some thirty or forty years ago, and adopted other measures and larger ones.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will my colleague state the difference in actual capacity between the two measures?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Certainly.

The Winchester bushel, used in the United States, contains 2150.42 cubic inches, while the imperial bushel of Great Britain contains 2218.192 cubic inches.

Mr. HOPKINS. What products have we in which we use the Winchester bushel in our commerce with Great Britain exclusively?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. The Winchester bushel is the only bushel recognized in the United States. It is the bushel of the United States. Of course, we have, as gentlemen would find if they take the trouble to read the report, different bushels in different States of the Union, a bushel which varies in different States in capacity.

Mr. HOPKINS. But will that make any difference as far as the shipments of wheat are concerned? In other words, are we not shipping wheat from this country by the pound?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. That is true. But we are using as the measure of our commerce what is known as the Winchester bushel, and estimating the number of pounds necessary to make a bushel of that capacity. On the other hand, Great Britain uses a larger measure.

Mr. HOPKINS. But Great Britain buys by the pound instead of by the bushel.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Yes; but a certain number of pounds are required to make a bushel, and if the capacity of the English bushel is greater than ours, of course it would contain a greater number of pounds.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will my colleague allow another interruption?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Certainly. Just permit me to say first, to conclude what I started to say, that the bushel varies in size in the different States, and as applied to different commodities. There are more pounds in the British bushel, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois as a general fact, than there are in the American bushel; necessarily, as there is greater capacity.

Mr. BROSIUS. As I understand it, we suffer a disadvantage by reason of that fact?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Undoubtedly a disadvantage, not only in the confusion arising from commercial transactions in measures that vary, but in the additional work required to translate or convert from the terms of one to the other. That the American people are not smart enough, however, to see that they get an equivalent for what they send abroad I have not undertaken to assert by any manner of means, but they are not smart enough to relieve themselves of the labor of converting from the one system to the other.

Now, as to the ease with which this system could be adopted, in response to the gentleman from Maine, we have simply the assertion of those people—those nations—which have already made the change. We can only determine it by the testimony of those nations that have tried the actual experiment of accomplishing the change among themselves. The United States is represented, and has been for many years, in the International Bureau of Weights and Measures by that eminent scientist, Prof. B. A. Gould, of Cambridge. In a recent letter bearing upon this very question, he says:

May I add that I have personally been a witness of the ease with which the change has been introduced in most European countries, as well as in various of the South American Republics, and that the ease with which the people have accepted the new units has been in every case a source of surprise. Our own country seems to be as well prepared for the change at present as it is likely to be at any time in the near future.

The British House of Commons about a year ago appointed a select committee to investigate the propriety or advisability of the adoption of this system by Great Britain, or, more accurately speaking, "to inquire whether any and what changes in the present system of weights and measures should be adopted." It consisted of seventeen eminent gentlemen, as I now recollect, the chairman being Sir Henry Roscoe. They considered the matter with great care for several months and presented a very full report upon the subject.

That committee, with a thoroughness characteristic of British proceedings, carried their investigation throughout the entire world, you may say. They called witnesses from some of the nations of Europe, and at least one witness from the United States. They called many of the most eminent citizens of the Kingdom of Great Britain. They investigated with special thoroughness and special care, and that committee, with only one dissenting vote, reported in favor of the compulsory adoption of this system by Great Britain—a great deal more compulsion than there is in this bill.

In their investigation they were careful to ascertain the ease or difficulty with which the transition could be made. On that point the committee report—

That very competent witnesses proved to the satisfaction of your committee that a compulsory change from an old and complicated system to the metrical had taken place in Germany, Norway and Sweden, Switzerland, Italy, and many other European countries without serious opposition or inconvenience; that this change was carried out in a comparatively short period, and that as soon as the simple character of the new system was understood, it was appreciated by all classes of the population, and no attempt to use the old unit or to return to the old system was made.

That is the conclusion of the committee of the British House of Commons, after a most careful and exhaustive investigation of that question. I have before me—and you will find them quoted in the report of the committee—extracts from the testimony of several of the witnesses called. Lord Kelvin, formerly Sir William Thomson, one of the most eminent scientists of Great Britain; Mr. Siemens, the noted engineer; Captain Sankey, the extensive manufacturer of machinery; Mr. Wollmer and Mr. Rowlitt, leading merchants, and Mr. Pilter, of the British Chamber of Commerce, all state their observation and personal knowledge of the ease with which the change was made in European countries and in part of Africa. Extracts from their testimony I will insert in the RECORD without stopping now to read.

Mr. HOPKINS. Did England adopt this report?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. The report has not yet been acted upon. It is now pending. The matter was presented to Mr. Balfour, representing the Government, and to one other officer whose name I do not now remember.

Mr. HOPKINS. That government has gone out of power, has it not?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Oh, no!

Mr. HOPKINS. I understood you to say Mr. Asquith was at the head of it?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I said the head of the committee was Sir Henry Roscoe.

Mr. HOPKINS. I misunderstood you.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. The chambers of commerce of Great Britain, and the trades councils, have taken much interest in this matter, and they presented to Mr. Balfour their request that the Government cooperate with the committee of the House of Commons in securing the adoption of this measure. Mr. Balfour replied to them in these words; which, with the permission of the House, I will read:

Upon the merits of the case I think there can be no doubt whatever that the judgment of the whole civilized world, not excluding countries which still adhere to the antiquated systems under which we suffer, has long decided that the metric system is the only rational system. * * * What men of science have long been obliged to do—not merely because the international character of science makes it desirable, but also because the calculations are so much more rapid, so much more convenient—what men of science for these reasons are obliged to do, I believe that ommercial firms in all parts of the country are beginning to think they must do also. On that point I do not think argument is possible.

Before leaving the question of the ease or difficulty with which this change is made, let me say that Mr. Siemens, who was in Germany at the time the change was made, and other witnesses proved that in two years, the probationary time allowed there, the change had been made with very little trouble or friction, and that when the time for compulsion came there was nobody to compel. And it was made in this way, apparently: It was announced that that would be at a certain time the legal system. The shopkeepers, the storekeepers, of the country anticipated that and obtained the standards, the weights, and the measures of the new system. They displayed them; they labeled them; they attracted the attention of the people to them. What was not understood when it was a mere matter of theory was readily understood when it was presented to the people in concrete form, and the people took a pride apparently in acquainting themselves with the system and then going to the shopkeepers and asking for commodities in terms of the new system to show that they were able to comprehend it; and when the time came they had already learned it and they were ready for the system, so that it was really adopted before the time fixed for its adoption.

Now, here we have the advantage over Germany and Austria very largely, in that we have had it as a permissive system for thirty years. The standards of this system have been sent to every State in the Union. Instruction in it has been accorded in the schools of almost every State in the Union, and beyond that we have a large element of our population which has come from the various metric-using nations of the world, and who have come here practically versed in this system and ready to take it up.

There is no question but that this system may be adopted in the United States with greater ease and with less friction than was ever done by any other nation that has tried the experiment. The testimony before the committee shows that even in Africa, among the negroes and Arabs of Tunis, the change was made without trouble and practically with no inconvenience. If I had time I would be glad to read the testimony of those witnesses and the testimony of men who introduced it in England in their workshops. One man was asked the question, "Did you suffer any inconvenience?" He said, "For a little while." He was asked, "Well, how long?" He answered, "About two days." That was his estimate of the time which it took his workmen to familiarize themselves practically with this system when they had it before them and must use it.

Mr. LAYTON. What was his business?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. He was engaged in building engines and boilers.

Mr. DALZELL. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Was there any testimony taken by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures in respect to this matter?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. There was testimony before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, consisting of the verbal statements of four or five gentlemen, including two members of Congress, and letters from Professor Mendenhall, who was long the head of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, from various officers of the Government, and other gentlemen of eminence throughout the country.

Mr. DALZELL. Did anybody appear before the committee resisting its adoption?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. No one appeared to resist its adoption.

Mr. DALZELL. Is there opposition by any person who has appeared before the committee on this question?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Not that I know of.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. What did the gentleman say about the testimony of Professor Mendenhall?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. The gentleman will find the testimony of Professor Mendenhall strongly indorsing this reform in the hearings which are printed and available to anyone desiring them.

Mr. DALZELL. Was not this matter taken up following the action of the last Congress—the Fifty-third Congress?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. The matter was not investigated in the Fifty-third Congress except to request the Secretary of the Treasury, the Chief of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Director of the Mint to communicate to the House their opinion as to the propriety of the adoption of the system, which they have done. The House passed such a resolution.

Mr. DALZELL. Is it not a fact that, as a matter of proposed legislation, this has been public for a long series of years?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. It has been a matter of proposed legislation at various times for twenty years. It was pending before the Fifty-second Congress, and the action of the Fifty-third Congress I have already stated. In that Congress an exclusively metric system of electrical measurement was enacted, and is entirely satisfactory. Professor Mendenhall, then Superintendent of the Coast Survey, appeared before the committee in the Fifty-second Congress, and made an exhaustive and able statement in favor of the adoption of this measure. His more recent letter will be found in the hearings had in this Congress, as I have stated.

Mr. HARTMAN. I desire to say to the gentleman that while I am in favor of the measure, I understand that there was one who was opposed to the adoption of this bill, and that was the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I stand corrected. The Secretary of the Interior, whose opinion I have read, states that he doubts the propriety of it in view of its possible effect on our commercial relations. In our commercial relations, as I have remarked, the measures of our products have to be translated into the denominations of every other nation with whom we trade, even including Great Britain in great part.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What States have adopted it?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. The nations that have adopted it are stated in the testimony of General Duffield, as follows: "Among the nations that have made the metric system compulsory are France, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Norway and Sweden, Switzerland, Servia, Roumania, Mexico, Brazil, Peru, Venezuela, and the Argentine Republic." There are some others not included in this list.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I just want to say one word before I leave that topic. I have stated that Great Britain is likely to adopt this system; that a committee of the House of Commons has indorsed it. There is a public sentiment there that demands it. There was presented among other testimony to that committee, as evidenced by the consular reports from eighteen or twenty leading commercial points, the fact that British commerce was being prejudiced and was losing its position because they had not the metric system which Germany and France and other competitors had. These consular reports are printed in the testimony taken before that committee, and they demonstrate beyond peradventure or chance of dispute that the commerce of Great Britain is suffering, seriously suffering, by reason of their adhering to their cumbersome and complicated system of weights and measures. The commerce of the United States certainly is affected by the same influences and suffering for the same reason. Now, then, the far-reaching effects of anything which tends to diminish British commerce and manufactures is fully comprehended in England by all classes, and representatives of the trades unions of Great Britain, representing a million and a quarter of laboring people of various trades, came before the committee of the House of Commons with a resolution unanimously adopted in favor of the adoption of the metric system, and were asked for their opinion of the bearing of this system upon their interests, and what induced them to trouble about a change in weights and measures. Their representative replied, and I ask your attention to that reply as evincing a clear and intelligent comprehension of this question, and of the interests of the laboring classes as involved therein. Their representative replied as follows:

Their chief inducement was the belief that it would be better for their children to be taught what was simplest and best—that much of the time now devoted to weights and measures might be used for something more profitable—and that as ratepayers they would get better value for their money. He further stated that the workmen he represented were alive to the fact that, "supposing by adhering to the old system we lose trade, the manufacturers suffer, and so do the workmen. One can not be affected without the other in a greater or less degree."

The workingmen of Great Britain appreciate the fact that the adoption of this system is necessary to retain trade, and hence to retain their own employment. Our own workingmen must appreciate the same conditions resting upon them. The workingmen are intelligent enough to know that their money is being wasted in the schools in teaching their children a complicated system which involves so much extra labor. The testimony before the English committee establishes the fact, and the committee state it in their report, that in the common schools at least a year's time is wasted in teaching the complicated system of weights and measures which we now have. That fact is corroborated by the testimony before your committee of such men as President Mendenhall, of the Worcester Polytechnic Institute; of President Sharpless, of Haverford College; of the secretary of the board of education of the State of Massachusetts, and of various other gentlemen capable of judging and of speaking intelligently upon that question. You have, then, the problem of an entire year in the school life of every child wasted in teaching the old system, and there are 15,000,000 of children in your schools——

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman says that Professor Mendenhall and others made the statement which he has just repeated as to the time that is wasted in teaching the present system. Is not the primary object of our schools to discipline the mind, and do not children get the discipline by studying the old system as well as by studying the new?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. That is an old question, Mr. Speaker. You may get the discipline by studying the relations between 12 and $5\frac{1}{2}$ and $7\frac{22}{105}$, indicating denominations of length, or between 24—20 and 12 in terms of troy weight, but you may get the same discipline and a store of useful information as well by applying your time to a better and simpler system.

Mr. HOPKINS. But is it not absurd for any man familiar with educational standards to say that the time is absolutely lost when the child is studying anything that requires mental effort?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Well, Mr. Speaker, I may put against the authority of the intelligent gentleman from Illinois—eminent, undoubtedly, in his vocation—the opinions of the eminent men connected with every department of education in Great Britain, who are indorsed by the committee in their statements, the testimony of the men in this country that I have mentioned, the testimony of Mr. Corthell, the great engineer, and many others, educators and practical men, who have given study to this subject, and all concurring in the opinion that it is a waste of time to seek the training of a child by a course of study which is practically useless, because, even if you do secure the intellectual training in that way, you can secure the same or better intellectual training by other methods, and at the same time acquire stores of useful knowledge.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman's argument would abolish the study of Latin and Greek. I do not suppose there are four members of this House, although they may be college graduates, who can read Demosthenes, or even Cicero, in the original, and yet those gentlemen received great benefit from the study of Latin and Greek when they were in their student days. According to your argument, it is absurd to teach those languages or to pursue the study of them, because they are of on real practical benefit in the ordinary course of life.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is trenching upon the long-disputed question as to whether time may be more profitably spent in the study of Latin and Greek, or in the study of the practical modern languages, French and German. But, sir, there is a practical use for Latin and Greek illustrated in this very matter. The shades of meaning, the definitions, the derivations, the very foundations of our language rest upon Latin and Greek, and the prefixes that are given to the terms employed in this metric system, derived from Latin and Greek, and universal as the world, indicate the meanings with a degree of accuracy and precision certainly not only remarkable but very advantageous. A knowledge of the Latin and of the Greek is useful in connection with the very matter we are discussing, and such knowledge is undoubtedly essential to a correct and careful appreciation of the shades of meaning in our language.

Mr. HOPKINS. Do not misunderstand me. I am not arguing that the system which you are advocating is not better than the one that we have. I simply took issue with your statement that it was an entire waste of time for a child to learn the old system of weights and measures.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he believes in his theory well enough to favor a bill that introduces more and additional confusing tables for the sake of discipline?

Mr. HOPKINS. That does not follow at all. I do not say that I am not in favor of the system which the gentleman from Pennsylvania is advocating, but I am not prepared to say that the old one is absolutely wrong. It is all a question of degree. If the system which the gentleman favors is better than the old one let us adopt it, but let us not deny that there is merit in the old system, too, and I hold that to denounce the study of the old system as a complete waste of time is illogical and unjust.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Has it occurred to the gentleman from Illinois that if, by the adoption of this new system, we save a year to those who are attending our schools, the year thus saved could very properly be employed in learning a little more of Latin and Greek?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not believe there is any truth in that statement; I do not care what professor may make it.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Well, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Did I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that all language rests on the Latin and the Greek?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. No, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Did not the gentleman say that Latin and Greek are the foundation of all language?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I said that those languages are largely the foundation of our own. Why, sir, the very terms used in this system—the meter, the liter, the decimeter, the centigram, etc.—are words which come to us by derivation from the Latin or the Greek; and these languages give to the student a knowledge of the nice distinctions of meaning between different words of our own language.

Mr. LACEY. I wish to ask the gentleman whether it is the intention that the first section of this bill shall take effect, and this system be in actual use by the public, as early as the 1st day of July, 1898.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. No, not by the public, but by the Departments of the Government.

Mr. LACEY. Suppose after the date I have named you should want to ascertain the weight of a letter sent by mail; would you adopt the metric weight or the old weight?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. The metric weight.

Mr. LACEY. Then how much would be an ounce? What would you call an ounce, using the terms of this system?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Let me refer the gentleman——

Mr. LACEY. I thought the gentleman could answer the question without reference to any document.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I can. The half ounce in postal matters is equivalent to 15 grams; and I call attention to the fact that by a law now on the statute book, and which has existed for thirty years, it is in the power of the Postmaster-General to-day to send all letters throughout this country, as he does all foreign letters, under the metric system, 15 grams being the equivalent of half an ounce. The act of 1866 is as follows:

The Postmaster-General shall furnish to the post-offices exchanging mails with foreign countries, and to such other offices as he may deem expedient, postal balances denominated in grams of the metric system, fifteen grams of which shall be the equivalent for postal purposes, of one-half ounce avoirdupois, and so on in progression.

And in the larger post-offices, the exchange offices of the country to-day, there are scales in which the various weights are marked according to the customary system on one side of the beam and according to the metric system on the other, so that the weight may be ascertained under either system.

But I desire to complete the point I was making as to the isolated position which the United States is likely to occupy among the commercial nations of the earth, unless we adopt this system and adopt it speedily. I have said that England must inevitably adopt this system; that it has the support, with only one dissenting voice, of the committee that has had the subject under consideration; that it is demanded throughout Great Britain by those classes of people who will make their will respected; and that legislation must inevitably in the near future place Great Britain in concert with the other commercial nations of the world in the use of this system.

We have supposed that Russia stood as the most backward of all the nations in the adoption of this system. I learn that by an imperial decree the metric system of weights and measures was last year made obligatory upon every physician and every pharmacist in the entire Russian Empire; that every man dealing out medicine is obliged in doing so to employ this system, which has the elements of accuracy.

As to the present position of Russia on this question from a business point of view, let me read from a communication dated March 16, 1896, written by a gentleman occupying a high official position in connection with the Russian Government. I ask attention to this gentleman's statement as to the present attitude of Russia, the most conservative, the most backward of all nations in this reform. He says:

Confirming my verbal explanations, I beg to inform you that, with the assent of the Emperor, our minister of finances has issued, on the 20th of February, 1896, a circular inviting all leading Russian merchants and manufacturers to meet during the exhibition of arts and manufactures in Nizni-Novgorod at a congress in the latter town, with the object of discussing various subjects relating to the measures for the promotion of Russian industries and trade.

The programme of questions to be discussed at that congress is given in the above-mentioned circular, and includes, among others, the query (clause 12) relating to the introduction of the metrical system of weights and measures.

It will thus be seen that the adoption of this system is a matter of present consideration by the great Russian Government; and it is probable that unless action be speedily taken the United States, instead of taking the lead, as Mr. Kasson says in his report we should do, in this great movement of progress, will be the last one to be dragged reluctant at the rear end of the column.

A gentleman near me inquires as to the adoption of this system by the different States of the Union. I have not exact figures in relation to that. I will simply say that Congress is vested by the Constitution with authority to do this work; that so far as the States have done it, it has been done in a heterogeneous way, and done only because the United States Government has not done it. I believe that the metric standards have been furnished by the Government to every State of the Union; that the means of applying these standards are in the custody and subject to the reference of the authorities in every State. If not, those State authorities are certainly entitled to have them.

Let me call attention to the further fact that while we have been using and are using to-day the customary system, yet by the decree of the Secretary of the Treasury as an executive act, three years ago, he established and recognized the international meter and the international kilogram as the fundamental standards of extension and weight. In other words, if to-day the yardstick or the pound in common use is to be tested, the test is their equivalent as measured by the international meter and the international kilogram. The very foundation and final authority of our present system, as now treasured up in the fireproof vaults of the Government, are the international prototypes received from the international bureau of which we are members—opened in the White House with great ceremony—and since preserved with extreme care, and when you want to find the length of a yardstick you find it by comparison with the meter.

So that this system is the fundamental standard now, by Executive order. The whole force and effect of the second section of this bill is a ratification by the legislative department of the Government, specially vested by the Constitution with that power, of what has already been done by the executive department. That section compels nobody. It simply establishes a legal standard to which reference may be had in case of dispute or necessity.

The subsequent sections of this bill provide a means of testing by this standard the accuracy of the common measures as well as the metric. After a certain date the Government must use the metric system, as prominent officers of the Government have recommended should be done. The people may use whatever system their interests dictate, but a standard for reference—scientific and accurate and practically universal—is established for them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while I have alluded to the loss of time during schoolboy days, I believe the loss in mature life entailed upon us by our cumbrous system of weights and measures is much greater. That such loss occurs in our dealings with foreign nations in converting their terms into ours or ours into theirs any one can see. Invoices on all our imports are made out in terms of the weights and measures of the nations from whence they come, and, as I have shown, the great bulk of these invoices come to the United States under the metric system. They must be converted into our system for purposes of taxation, as well as for sale and purposes of internal commerce. With an international system, used in common with other nations, this time and labor would be saved. But when you go beyond that, and consider simply the convenience in our domestic transactions of our present system of currency—the decimal system—and reflect for a moment upon the difficulty of transforming a single item of purchase or trade into the English system of pounds, shillings, and pence, and see the saving of time that is accomplished by the use of our decimal system instead of the system of Great Britain, you will be able to appreciate the absolute importance and the saving in time that can be achieved by using the decimal system in connection with all measures of substance and distance. By the convenience of a single computation in dollars and cents under our system as compared with pounds, shillings, and pence, we can appreciate how much would be the saving of labor and time if in every sale or purchase, in every commercial transaction, we employed a system with a decimal basis instead of the crude system which we are now using. The great saving and convenience in computation by the use of the decimal system as applied to all of these transactions in everyday life would be absolutely beyond calculation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we desire to dispose of this bill, if possible, to-night, and I will reserve any time that I may have left.

Mr. CLARDY. I would like the gentleman, before he takes his seat, to explain the foundation of the system which he proposes to adopt. What is the real unit of measurement?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CLARDY. I hope the gentleman will explain the unit of measurement of this system, and how it is obtained.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. If there is no objection, Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to explain.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I will occupy the attention of the House but for a few moments.

The foundation of the entire system—the metric system—is the meter. That was obtained originally by the measurement of an arc of a meridian, after great labor and expense, by the most eminent scientists of Europe, who were engaged on this work for a period of seven years. One ten-millionth part of the quadrant of that meridian, passing through Dunkirk, in Europe, is a meter. Its length is equivalent to about 39.37 inches of our present system of measurement. From that are derived all of the other measures. The meter is divided, for instance, into the decimeter, which is one-tenth of a meter, or about four inches in length; the centimeter, or hundreth of a meter, which is about four-tenths of an inch; and the cubic decimeter is the unit on which rests measures of capacity, and the cubic centimeter of water gives us the gram, the unit of weight, all being thus traceable directly back to the unit of the system, the meter. [Applause.]

EXTRACTS FROM TESTIMONY TAKEN BEFORE THE COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

From testimony of Lord Kelvin:

I believe that the difficulty of making the change has been enormously exaggerated. I believe that in a fortnight people would become so accustomed to the perfect simplicity and easy working under the metrical system that they will feel that, instead of its being a labor to pass from one system to the other, it will be less than no labor—that is to say, it would be a very great saving of labor after the first day or two of beginning to use the metrical system.

Mr. Siemens, the noted engineer, testifying as to its introduction into his own works, said:

It was all a matter of about a fortnight or three weeks; then the people were accustomed to it and did not ask any more for the old measures, but asked for the new.

And speaking of his observation of its general introduction into Germany, he said:

Q. Did I understand you aright, that it was about four years during which the transition took place? The act was passed in 1868, and it was made absolutely compulsory in 1872, was it?—A. Yes.

Q. And there was really not anything that you may fairly call friction or national opposition on the part of the masses of the people?—A. No; not at all. In fact, as far as I recollect it, the metrical system was very largely adopted between the 1st of January, 1870, and the 1st of January, 1872, during the optional period. It was very largely adopted then, and was found to work so well that when the compulsory time came there was nobody to be compelled.

Captain Sankey, after explaining the practical advantages of the system in his extensive boiler and steam-engine manufactory, testified, in answer to questions as to its introduction, as follows:

Q. Have you found any difficulty with your workmen in that respect?—A. Absolutely none.

Q. Do they adopt it and see the advantages of the system?—A. I should say so. In fact, in connection with my coming here this afternoon, I asked four or five of our men privately (not through the works' manager) what they thought of it, and there was not a dissentient voice among them. They all agreed at once that the millimeters were very much easier to work to than the English measurements.

Q. I understand you found your men had not the slightest difficulty in adapting themselves almost immediately to the new system?—A. Not after the first few days. I asked that very question of the head of our tool room, and he said it was a little awkward for a time. I said, "About how long?" and he said "Two days."

Mr. H. E. Wollmer, of the great mercantile firm of Sir Jacob Behrens & Sons, testified as to its introduction into Germany as follows:

In Germany I noticed when the change was being made everybody became a teacher; the schoolmaster was a teacher, the shopkeeper was a teacher, and everybody had this very thing in view; the schoolmaster, the trader, the children, and everybody. It became a practical question. They knew they had to be ready when the time came, and they were ready before the time came.

Mr. Rowlett, a Leicester merchant, testified:

Q. You had dealings with Germany about the time of its adoption?—A. I had.

Q. And, as far as you understand, its adoption was accomplished with, comparatively speaking, ease?—A. Certainly. I have always understood them as speaking of it as having gone through with scarcely any friction.

Mr. Pilter, of the British Chamber of Commerce, testified:

I have property in Tunis, and I am obliged to spend a certain part of my time there each year. The people of that country, the Arabs and the negroes, have had introduced among them quite lately the decimal system of coinage, the French system; and within the last few months, perhaps eight months, the metric system of weights and measures has been introduced, and they grasp it easily and without difficulty. They had before them a system of 12 saas to the ouiba, and 16 ouibas to the caffis; but they have learned the liters and the meters very easily.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise with some diffidence to oppose the measure now pending, in view of the very scientific and learned argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has just taken his seat. Unfortunately, as his face was turned from me, I lost a portion of his remarks.

Before discussing the scientific proposition which is presented I wish to touch briefly upon the educational feature of the discussion. The gentleman from Pennsylvania said that the foundations in large part of our language were the Latin and the Greek, from which so many of our words were derived. It is true that to a considerable extent our words have been derived from the Latin and the Greek, and so from their original source, the Sanskrit; but the best words in the English language never came from either the Latin or the Greek. They came entirely from the Anglo-Saxon spring; and it is due to the influence of the Anglo-Saxon upon our language that we have such works as the Bible, as the plays of Shakespeare, and the speeches of Daniel Webster. Were I to bring up a boy and were I to desire to instill into him the true meaning and principle of the English language, I should say, "Drink deep at the source of Anglo-Saxon and leave for your leisure hours the Latin and Greek authors, except in so far as their study may be a mental discipline."

I would not say a word against the ancient tongues, especially Latin and Greek, for if I controlled any college to-day I should make the study of these two languages not elective, but absolutely requisite.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his admiration for the French and the Continental systems of weights and measures, would say that all, or almost all, that is good in our language must come from the Latin sources. Why, gentlemen have come to me since this debate was introduced and said, "Let us adopt this international system, because it will ultimately secure that international bimetallic agreement on which all our hopes are centered." [Laughter.] Now, it is proposed, in the closing hour of this day——

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Is that the reason you are opposing the bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. That is not the reason. But, as is well known, I am a gold-standard monometallist. So there is no question about my position.

Mr. TOWNE. Perhaps the gentleman will favor this system fter England adopts it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. It is proposed now, in the closing hours of this day, only three-quarters of an hour before our usual hour of adjournment, to change absolutely the system of weights and measures in the United States, not after any prolonged or scientific discussion, not after any careful consideration, but because the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman, I believe, of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, comes and says, "Let us wait no longer, because Mr. Balfour is in favor of it, and although Great Britain has not adopted it, eminent scientists on the continent of Europe think that there should be a change." So in half an hour 67,000,000 or 70,000,000 people of the United States are to be told that there is no longer such a legal entity as a pound, that they no longer weigh 60 or 70 or 170 pounds, but so many grams.

To-morrow morning every man, woman, and child in the United States will have lost his or her weight. They will no longer be of so many pounds avoirdupois, but so many grams in weight. To-morrow morning there will be no man 6 feet in stature throughout the United States, but every man will be so many meters in height and every little schoolgirl and schoolboy will stand aghast at the proposition. They have been studying other systems of weights and measures all their lives; but because it pleases the representatives of the people of the United States one afternoon to sweep the whole fabric away which has existed ever since our colonial times, ever since time immemorial as far as we are concerned, it is all to be obliterated, not in a night, but in three-quarters of an hour on one afternoon in April, 1896.

Now let me call your attention to the fact that for nearly thirty years the people of the United States have had the very rare privilege, have had the absolute right, of enjoying and using this marvelous metric system. This, to my mind, is a salient and pertinent objection. This has been on our statute books ever since a certain day in July, 1866, and since that day it has been lawful for the people of the United States to avail themselves of every principle contained in the metric system. Have our people done so? Have they cried out with the eloquence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE] that we must abandon these old, pernicious Anglo-Saxon systems of weights and measures and secure the priceless boon of a new Latin system? I say that the very fact that they have not, the very fact of the indisposition of the people of the United States to abandon the system of weights and measures to which they have been accustomed from time immemorial, should justify the denial of the passage of this law.

Now let us see what the committee do. Instead of taking the whole system in its entirety they only take part. We adopt what? We adopt the metric standard of weights; we adopt the metric standard of measures; but we decline to adopt the standard of capacity or the standard of surface measures. If you look at the tables appended to the section of the Revised Statutes in question you will find set forth four different tables. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures adopts two of those tables, but not the other two, as obligatory. That is, they decline to adopt the measure of capacity, of which the liter is the unit, and they decline to adopt the measure of surface, of which the centare is the unit. The liter or unit of capacity is 1.0567 quarts. The centare is 1,550 square inches. They take special care to provide that the measurement of the public lands shall not be made according to the new system.

Now, if this system were right, why should this exception be made? What logic is there, what scientific argument can be adduced, for leaving out the measurement of the public lands? There is another not only scientific criticism, but also a verbal criticism——

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. If the gentleman desires information as to the public-land surveys, I shall be very glad to tell him.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Not now, Mr. Speaker. Just wait until I get through. In reference to the standard of weights, they take the kilogram, which is equivalent to 2.2046 pounds. Now, a kilogram means 1,000 grams, and to have any harmony in the system you should adopt the gram and the meter, or the kilogram and the kilometer, because a kilometer is 1,000 meters and a kilogram is 1,000 grams; but in reference to the one they take the kilogram, or 1,000 times what should be the proper unit, and in reference to the other they take the meter, which might be called the initial or base measurement; that is, they take 39.37 inches as the unit instead of 3,280 feet and 10 inches.

So I submit, gentlemen, that for these various reasons you should not pass this bill hastily this afternoon. Then I desire from a commercial standpoint to call your attention to the fact that the great country with which the great bulk of our trade now exists has never adopted this system. Great Britain has not adopted this system and there is no certainty that she ever will adopt it. So I say, in conclusion, let us go slowly. Let us wait at least until this question can be fairly considered before we adopt off hand this measure which is hastily presented to us in the declining hours of this day.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, the fact that other countries may have adopted the metric system cuts no figure with me. When I had to come back into the Union some thirty years ago by special invitation I learned to believe, and have since believed, that the United States was big enough to have a system of its own of everything, including a monetary system. Now, we are called upon here this evening to adopt the metric system; and I venture to say there is not a member of Congress present who can repeat one of the tables of that system. If we had been ordered in this bill to speak the German language it would have been just as possible with me and with you as it would to learn this metric system so suddenly. And to be forced by law to speak the German language would be as bad as pulling teeth.

Now, sir, before voting upon any proposition, although I am one of the long-suffering new members, "spring chickens," I believe they call them, I would like to know what I am voting for. We have been told that some of these terms are derived from the Latin and others from the Greek, which are languages with which I am not perceptibly familiar. But I would at least like to know how many of these things it takes to make one mariagram [myriagram]. [Great laughter.] Myriagram! What is that? [Renewed laughter.] Just as well call it Black Maria.

There is another important thing, Mr. Speaker, that I observe has been overlooked. I have an arithmetic here, and I notice we have a "long measure," and we have a "surface measure." They have not spoken of that. In surface measure an are is all powerful. This is called an "are" because it are an are I suppose. I suppose you pronounce it "air." One hundred centares make one are. "Centares" not centaurs, I suppose is what they call them. [Laughter.] And then 100 ares make 1 hectare. And what a hectare is this deponent saith not. [Renewed laughter.] Will you tell me how many of those ares are in a half section of land, 160 acres? [Great laughter.] You go on and you tell me about the "cubic measure." You then go on and give the "measures of weight." Where is your wet measure for whisky? [Laughter.] Where is your "wet measure"? Going to do away with barrels? You have got no "wet measure" here at all. [Laughter.] How could the old darky get a pint Saturday night? Do you propose to do away with whisky? [Laughter and applause.] I have no objection, but say so if you are. Kentucky would have something to say about that, if you do. [Renewed laughter.] I learn that the whole delegation is opposed to this bill. [Renewed laughter.] And, I suppose, on that account. [Laughter.] They know how many peas are in a pint. I am not surprised the gentleman should refer us to Africa about learning the metric system. That will do for people sunned in the Tropics. But, sir, there is not a man on this floor who can tell me what a decaliter is. If there is let him stand up and speak. I pause for a reply. [Laughter.] There is none.

Now, I am completely in the dark. I do not know how many hectograms it would take to make a drink. [Laughter.] I am sure I do not know, because I am not accustomed to that sort of thing myself. [Renewed laughter.] Decaliters, hectoliters, deciliters, kiloliters, lamplighters, kilograms, kilometers, decigrams, mariagrams, and myriagrams. [Great laughter.] This would open a night school for Congressmen. Now, we are told Mr. Balfour is in favor of this. So I understand. But that is England! We do not want to do everything that England does. We want to have some little measures of our own here. Now, the gentleman expects us to vote for this thing to-night. What thing? Who knows? Well, I am in the same position as I was on the Cuban question—I do not know which side I am on yet. This is going in too big a hurry. There is not a gentleman on the floor that would go to his home and wake up to-morrow morning, and if this bill should have passed would know whether he weighed a "mariagram" or measured a decameter, or whether his cocktail was by long or wet measure.

Now, gentlemen—I beg pardon, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House; I should pronounce it Hows—when you talk about changing our system to the metric system, as if it were simply "Presto, change," changing our good old inch, our yards, our poles, and things of that kind, I want to know if there is anywhere in this bill anything to tell how many eggs make a dozen? Are you going to change a dozen to ten? What are you going to do with the various systems that we have in this country? You expect the children to come out and teach us what to do.

Mr. Speaker, you can not do it in so short a time. You will have to go out and let all of these fellows know that are selling whisky and eggs and all that sort of thing that they may study milliliters, decameters, and myriagrams. Let us have a rest for a while and get ready to do this thing. I tell you it would create a panic if you should pass this bill to-night. [Great laughter.]

Sir, as one gentleman has asked how this thing originated, I thought I would prepare myself by getting Venable's Arithmetic. It is the first time I have looked into it since I left college, and I hardly knew where to find it. But I knew that some distinguished gentlemen in France determined that they would have another system of measures. They took the arc of a circle from the pole down to the equator—they had to assume all that about the pole, because they could not get there—and then they found that that circle measured so much, and then they divided it by one ten-millionth. Think of it! They figured out how much this was.

Now, there is not a member of Congress that can do that. [Great laughter.] There is not a man that can divide that circle by one ten-millionth. But they say that that would be 39.37 inches. Then how do they get the others? They take about one ten-thousandth part of that—so that I may make no mistake, I shall refer to the book. They take part of that and call it a meter. They talk of the children doing this. [Laughter.] Think of it! They then take one ten-thousandth part of that and measure it and put a little line there and another perpendicular to it and call that an are, and then they put in another line at right angles to that, and they call that a liter; and they fill the little cube with water, and whatever that weighs is the much-talked-of gram, but by no means a good dram, and then I do not know what they call the others. I believe they are the meter, the are, the liter, with all the prefixes—milli, centi, deci, deca, hecto, and kilo—enough to kill us.

Now, after they have done all that, the children discover that they have arrived at some way to get at this measure and their weight which has made them collegiate graduates almost, has trained them so that they can almost speak Latin and Greek and the other language from which our own language is derived. Now, ask the child how he gets the inch, his scruples, pennyweights, etc. Ask the members of this House, and I think you will find very few of them that can tell you. There has been no need of knowing in the past. I do not know myself. [Laughter.] It is true that they took a few grains of wheat as a standard for the troy weight, but wheat was found too unstable. But now how are you going to use your Troy weight when you get into an apothecary's shop with these fractional parts of the distance from the pole to the equator? The thing is so small that they never do measure or weigh by it, but just throw some little thing in the scale, no matter what it is, put the drug in the other scale, and charge you 35 or 40 cents for it. [Laughter.] I tell you, gentlemen, there is only one way to do this thing, and that is by an international agreement. [Laughter.] That is the only way you can do it. [Laughter.] It does not make any difference what England or what Germany or what France does. I do not wonder that they adopt this system in Africa. We all know how highly educated and cultivated they are in that country, and I do not wonder they want it [laughter]; but when you come to the great United States, this great country that I am proud to call my own, and under whose flag I expect to go if we have anything to go for—the idea of our coming here to talk about Mr. Balfour or anybody else and what he proposes to do is to me belittling our own country. For my part, may the old United States be right; but, right or wrong, I am for the United States. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HURLEY. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to say anything upon this question. I would much rather vote. However, it has occurred to me to say a few words in reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. OTEY], and also in reply to my colleague from New York [Mr. BARTLETT], who spoke of our being hurried into this matter. Mr. Speaker, it is thirty years since the metric system was made permissive in this country. It has been in our schoolbooks ever since that time. It has been long under consideration. The point about our being hurried was, I believe, the only point that was made by my colleague against the pending bill. He told us something about Latin and Greek, but he did not favor us with many sentences of pure Saxon-English himself. [Laughter.] While the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. OTEY] who has just sat down was speaking, I could not help thinking how readily anybody with the gentleman's gift of wit could make fun of our present system of weights and measures. The foundation of the common measure is, I believe, "the barleycorn, true and plump." I think that is the description of it in the old law books. The gentleman could make a good deal of fun of that. I could do it myself if I had his gift.

The gentleman wanted to know how whisky was to be measured under the new system. There is no difficulty about that under either system. But under the present system we have "drachms," and "gills," and "pipes," and "tuns," and a good many more names, out of which, in the hands of a gentleman gifted in that way, more fun could be made than the gentleman has made out of the names in the metric system. We have a "point," a "line," a "barleycorn," a nail, a hand, a link, a span, a foot, a cubit, a yard, an ell, a fathom, a rod, a perch, a pole, a furlong, a mile, a league, and a great many other such names. You will find them in the arithmetic, taking up a couple of pages. The gentleman from Virginia, if he would turn his attention to butts, pounds, and scruples, might make them even more ridiculous than he has been able to make the names in the metric system. But, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in that. The metric system is founded on science. It is in use in 27 nations of the world, and it ought to be in use in a country like this. I do not care to say anything further about it at present, but will reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question, if no one desires to speak, and in explanation of that action I wish to say——

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I desire to dispose of this matter to-night, but I will yield to the gentleman such time as he desires.

Mr. PARKER. I ought to say that I shall speak against the measure.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I will yield the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like more time than that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I desire to close the debate to-night, and if the gentleman from New Jersey will agree to any reasonable time, I shall be satisfied. I desire to dispose of the matter this evening only because I understand that arrangements have been made by which other measures are proposed for the consideration of the House to-morrow, and, in good faith, I desire, if possible, to get this matter out of the way. Will the gentleman be satisfied with fifteen minutes?

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I can hardly make any agreement for time except to say that I will not detain the House unnecessarily. With no preparation and no notice of this bill till this afternoon, I can not condense the facts and the views that I desire to present into a very short time. I think I shall get through in a quarter of an hour, but I do not want to limit myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I consider this bill as very much more important than it has been probably thus far regarded by this House. It is an absolute novelty in the legislation of the United States. It provides in the first section that in 1898 the metric system only—nothing else—shall be employed in the Departments of the United States. No such provision has ever been adopted by the United States of America as to any system of weights and measures—the one now in use or any other. The bill also provides that after 1901 the metric system shall be the only legal standard of weights and measures in the United States. No such enactment has ever been adopted before. Let us deal with the question practically.

This bill tells you that after 1898 the metric system shall be the only one recognized in the various Departments of the Government. Now, sir, it is well known that we have coast surveys which show by their scale of miles, nautical miles and kilometers, how far by each scale it is from one place to another, how many miles, nautical miles or kilometers, it is from place to place. Such a thing is forbidden by the bill under consideration, however convenient the arrangement may be to our seamen.

Referring to our customs laws, I find it provided that invoices from other countries shall be made out in the weights, measures, and currencies of those countries, without any reference to the standards used in the United States. That provision is intended for the purpose of securing honest invoices made out in accordance with the standards in the countries from which the goods come. But this bill says that after the date named this shall not be done.

Some gentleman here may own ships. At any rate, we have tonnage laws based upon feet and inches, and in those terms the capacities of vessels are expressed. This bill says that after its provisions take effect no man shall register a ship without translating those terms into meters, kilometers, etc.; and that after 1901 these terms shall be the only ones recognized in such measurements.

Mr. Speaker, a compulsory enactment like this, requiring that the people of the United States shall measure their weight by kilograms (we might as well say, as Englishmen do, by the stone instead of by pounds), is a novelty. To say that a man shall no longer measure his height by feet and inches or use those terms as units, but must take something a little over a yard as the unit, is a novelty in legislation.

Mr. Speaker, such legislation is unknown in a free country, however familiar it may be in countries which are not free. This system has not been adopted by England as a compulsory one, as one that must be used; and if we attempt to make a system of this kind compulsory, the people will resent it, because they resent being told that they shall not use their accustomed standards, which they prize as conveniences, from whatever source they may be derived.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly, if the gentleman does not draw me off from the line of my argument.

Mr. HOPKINS. If this system be adopted, all the school books relating to mathematics will have to be rewritten, will they not?

Mr. PARKER. I do not know.

Several MEMBERS. Yes.

Other MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. PARKER. Well, I will let gentlemen settle that question for themselves. Certainly men will have to learn to reckon from one system into the other, for I assume we shall deal with the statutes as we have them; we shall not rewrite the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the gentleman know any primary school in his State or in the United States where the metric system is taught?

Mr. PARKER. Not in any of the primary schools.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am speaking of the primary schools.

Mr. PARKER. I am not sure as to that, I am not talking for professors; I am talking for the people of the United States.

Sir, I was reading not long ago in the report of the Director of the Mint the thoughts of Morris, the thoughts of Jefferson, the thoughts of Hamilton; and I found that when they were establishing the money unit their principle was to take a unit which was well known by the people. They took the old "piece of eight," which was called in common language the dollar, as their unit. They took it not because it was new but because it was old. They took it because the people understood it. They made that the unit of value. But did they say there should be no other unit of value? No. The Constitution provided that Congress might fix the value of foreign coin; and Congress did so. By various acts (see Revised Statutes, section 3565), the value of the pound sterling was fixed like that of the dollar, so that it could be dealt in. In every State it was allowed to make contracts in the pounds and shillings of that State.

Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the metric system considered in itself. It is a good system; it was rightly authorized as an optional measure by the act of Congress of 1866. As I read that act on page 704 of the Revised Statutes, this system can be used by any person in the United States if he wishes to use it. What I object to is the provision that says no other weights or measures shall be used. Up to this time the weights and measures in the United States have not been fixed arbitrarily by statute. Under the customs law, as I understand it—not having had time since the debate began to find it in the statutes, I may mistake in stating the law, but at any rate, under the laws of the United States—the officers of the United States, for the purpose of the customs revenue of the country, obtained a standard from the English Government of the foot and the standard bushel, of the standard measure as well as the standard weight, and keep them, so that men in commerce may avail themselves of them if they desire to do so. We all know the time when the ton was changed from 2,240 pounds to 2,000 pounds, and nevertheless people in certain States prefer to use the old ton up to this time. It is not forbidden, but this provision of law, if enacted, forbids the use of either the old or the new ton.

Something has been said of a decimal system. A decimal system, Mr. Speaker, is not peculiar to the metric system. Go to any Coast Survey map, and my recollection is that the distances are given in miles and thousandths of a mile. Go to any railroad survey, and you usually find the distance is given in a unit measure of distance and in hundredths and thousandths of that measure. The use of the decimal system in the measurement of buildings has become quite common in the last few years; that is feet and hundredths of a foot. Measuring rules are made divided into tenths and hundredths of an inch for machinists. The decimal system can be used. It is used. It is in common use. Weights, by scientific men, are almost always given in grains, and thousandths, or grams and thousandths, or pounds and thousandths, or tons and thousandths, and so on with all other weights. But these are weights that we are used to. We know what a man means when he tells you that he weighs so many pounds. We do not know what he means when he says that he weighs so many stone, and will not know what his weight is when given in kilos.

Now, in reference to Government business, the Post-Office could change its mailing scales to this system without hurting anyone particularly. We would, perhaps, have some trouble with our mail contracts, which are made in pounds or tons. But in reference to letters we do not care; it would be a matter of no consequence whether they were measured in ounces, half ounces, or any other unit. We could simply take the Post-Office scale and thus weigh them and see whether they came within the postage weight. But when you come to business transactions, customs, contracts, and the like, and declare that men shall not use the old measures, that there shall be only one legal system, of new standards which have not been adopted in the United States in the history of the country until now, I think you are doing something that is going to involve an immense amount of trouble without any corresponding benefit. Why should this be obligatory? We never had such a provision with reference to the bushel; we never were told that we should use no other measure than the foot; the nation never said that we must use measures with which we are not familiar. It simply said, we give you a standard, you may use it or not, as you please.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt to ask him please to indicate in what part of the bill provision is made that the people shall not use any other measures than those known as the metric system?

Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir; I will. The gentleman will find these words in the bill—

That from and after the 1st day of July, 1898, all the Departments of the Government——

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE (interrupting). My question is as to the restriction on the people, to which the gentleman referred.

Mr. PARKER. Wait a moment; I will answer the question.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Let me state it so that there can be no misunderstanding. You said that this was compulsory on the people; that they were prohibited from using any other system than that prescribed in this bill—that the people, not the Government, were prohibited from using any other system—and I ask you to show me where in the bill such a prohibition on the people exists?

Mr. PARKER. Well, will the gentleman allow me to answer?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Certainly; I would like to have an answer, if the gentleman has the question.

Mr. PARKER. I understand the question.

I state that the two sections taken together explain each other, and you will find that the effect is to prohibit the use to the people of any other system. It is provided—

That from and after the 1st day of July, 1898, all the Departments of the Government of the United States, in transaction of all business requiring the use of weight and measurement, except in completing the survey of the public lands, shall employ and use only the weights and measures of the metric system.

That means that the people, in dealing with the Departments of the Government after July, 1898, can use no other system than the metric system, and that they have got to learn to deal by it. Does not it mean that? I ask the gentleman if that is not the meaning of it?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. It means just what it says.

Mr. PARKER. Does not it mean that in dealing with the customs officers, or with any other officers of the Government, or in making any contract with the Government, the people must deal with it only in this new system?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. So far as the operations of the Government are concerned, this system is required to be used. But where are the people prohibited from using another system? So far as they are concerned, they can use either system at their own will.

Mr. PARKER. But if they are dealing with the Government are they not compelled to use it and nothing else? Does not it mean that? I think it does.

Now, this bill goes on to say:

SEC. 2. That from and after the 1st day of January, 1901, the metric system of weights and measures shall be the only legal system of weights and measures recognized in the United States.

That means that the people will have no longer the standard foot, they will not have the standard bushel, the yard, or the mile, or any other measure with which they are familiar, and that this new system will be the only legal system of measures and weights recognized in the United States.

Now, a uniform system is a well-known thing. The power of Congress to fix the standard of weights and measures has been construed thus far by the fathers of our country and by everyone else as the establishment of fixed and uniform standards under which the people may act. Congress has likewise gone so far as to say, in the year 1866:

It shall be lawful throughout the United States of America to employ the weights and measures of the metric system; and no contract or dealing, or pleading in any court, shall be deemed invalid or liable to objection because the weights or measures expressed or referred to therein are weights or measures of the metric system.

Mr. HOPKINS. What is the date of that statute?

Mr. PARKER. The date is 1866. Then follow two pages of tables, showing such units as the decameter and the decimeter, one of which is 100 times the other; the decaliter and the deciliter, which stand in the same relation; the decagram and the decigram, which bear a similar relation to each other. And I ask, Mr. Speaker, if these weights and measures were so much better than what we had before, why are they not in common use now? If they brought in the decimal system with them, why are they not in use now? The reason is that the standards are different. That law did not introduce the decimal system. We use the decimal system with tons and pounds and grains. It is used with miles and feet and inches. It is used with all these, and with the greatest convenience in all business, and it is used with these units because people know what feet and inches mean, and they do not propose to change.

Now, scientists can talk about a unit based on a line around the earth. The odd thing about the matter is that, being intended to be an absolute measure, based on the size of the earth, upon a parallel of latitude or a meridian of longitude, I have forgotten which, running in a certain direction and through a certain point, the scientists measured the meridian wrong, and everybody admits, as I understand, that the meter as now established is absolutely inconsistent with its own standard.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Oh, no; the highest authorities say it is accurate. There is no better authority than Dr. Barnard, and he says it is accurate.

Mr. PARKER. I have always heard it was inaccurate.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Very well. There are many other things about which there is erroneous information.

Mr. HOPKINS. Dr. Barnard says that. Who else ever said anything about it?

Mr. PARKER. I have always heard that it is inaccurate, but I do not care. We have got to go to a certain standard. I would rather go to a standard in the Tower, or in the possession of our Secretary of the Treasury, than to measure between the equator and the North Pole to get a standard. This metric system is a theory. It is a theory that it is better to dispense with the old unit and take a new unit, because those particular units have happened to please the gentlemen in France who got up this universal, world-embracing system of meters.

Now, remember I am not attacking that system. Do not misunderstand me. I say as to that system that it is as good as any other, and I say it is right to permit its employment where it is preferred. I think that for purely scientific work, when you are dealing with the world of science, it is well, and perhaps imperative, that all should have the same unit. But practical popular use is another thing, and for a statute to say now, after thirty years of permission, during which time it has not come into general use, that all other standards and units of weight and measurement shall come to an end at a fixed date, and that we shall compel its adoption before the great commercial nation of the world has adopted it—I say that this is revolutionary, and that, no matter how many scientific men, no matter how many foreign merchants, no matter how many men, mostly scientific, from colleges and similar institutions, come to us and say that they believe that this should be made the only standard, and that nobody should be allowed to use any other, I say it is wrong to do so. It is not practical, it is not according to the practical uses of the people, and no matter how much these theorists wish it, no matter how much I may admire the system as a system, I will not be so arbitrary as to say to my fellow-countrymen that this shall be the only system in which they can deal with their Government or with one another.

Mr. Speaker, I have said all that I care to say.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me two or three minutes?

Mr. PARKER. With pleasure, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS (to Mr. CANNON). Suppose you take your time to-morrow.

Mr. CANNON. I can say in a minute or two, by way of suggestion, all that I desire to say.

I must confess that I have not given much attention to this bill and the gentleman in charge of it is perfectly familiar with it; but I will say that I have no doubt that, if our people were as thoroughly familiar with the system which it is proposed here to legalize as they are with the present system, there would be no objection to it. I should think very likely it would be superior. I understand that under the Constitution there is no doubt about our power to enact this legislation, and we have had the legal right to use this system for thirty years. And yet, after thirty years of permissible use of this system, when we think of weights and measures, we think—I was going to say, in English—we think in pounds, or tons, or feet, or inches, as we have been taught. Our people universally understand what those words mean. It has been that way for a long time, and was so before there was any United States. It may be said to run through our literature; and although we have the power to enact this legislation, I do not believe it is in the power of Congress to bring that system into use by statute. If we undertake to legalize it to the exclusion of any other, I think it will beget great confusion, and that we shall subject ourselves to much criticism, without effecting the reform which the gentleman thinks is desirable. It may be that I am wrong about it. I give you my impression as it comes to me somewhat hastily; but I shall have to be further advised than I now am before I can vote for this bill.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I desire simply to explain that the Land Department was left out of this bill at the request of the Commissioner of the Land Office, because a portion of the surveys had been made and the external lines had been run, the term measure being a general one in surface measures.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to cut off debate, but I promised to ask a vote on this measure to-night, and, in carrying out my promise, I ask for the previous question.

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Speaker, are amendments in order?

The SPEAKER. Not if the previous question is adopted.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 80.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I ask for the yeas and nays; and, pending that, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is not treating the House fairly.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I desire simply to have a vote in the full House.

Mr. HOPKINS. We have got a full House now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to move an adjournment.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. There are several of the gentlemen of the committee here who say there is not a full House, and they desire to have a vote in the full House.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 98, noes 50.

The SPEAKER. Before announcing the result the Chair will submit the following.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. TUCKER, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

By Mr. WARNER: Evidence in support of House bill No. 7167, to correct the military record of James Houselman, second lieutenant Company H, Sixty-third Illinois Volunteer Infantry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 8, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. ALLEN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, in further response to a resolution of the Senate of the 16th ultimo, calling for information touching the condemnation of lands needed for the construction of the proposed boat railway at The Dalles of the Columbia River in Oregon, transmitting a letter from the United States attorney for the district of Oregon containing additional information to that already furnished; which, with the accompanying letter, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation of $40,000, to pay amounts found to be due under contracts for the survey of public lands in California, executed prior to June 30, 1890; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting a report upon the expenditures of the agricultural experiment stations, and the draft of a resolution providing for the printing of 2,000 copies thereof for the use of that Department; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Francis F. Williams Eighteenth Ward Republican Battery, of Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for the speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Young People's Conference of the Reformed Episcopal Churches of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation granting protection to Americans in Turkey and extending sympathy to the suffering Armenians; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present the petition of William O. Junkins, mayor of the city of Portsmouth, N. H., and 175 other citizens of that city. As the petition is somewhat unique, I will take the liberty of stating its contents.

The petitioners state that they would look with regret upon a possible rupture of the friendly relations existing between this country and Great Britain, and they hope that the present dispute with regard to Venezuela will be speedily and amicably adjusted. They also express deep regret at the atrocities inflicted upon the Armenians of late by the Turks and Kurds, and express great concern for the future safety of that people. They say that they believe those barbarous votaries of Islam should never be allowed any more to vent their spite upon this or any other Christian people, and that steps should be taken forthwith by this Government to insure the lives and property of the unfortunate Armenians. To that end they recommend an alliance with England and other European powers on this question. They hope that an Anglo-American fleet and army of sufficient strength may be dispatched to the East to occupy Armenia and the Holy Land and to establish an Anglo-American protectorate over those countries, with full independence from Turkey, as the only guaranty for the future safety of the Christians living there; and, if need be, to take Constantinople.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a joint resolution of the city councils of the city of Portsmouth, N. H., setting forth the desirability and necessity of building a dry dock in that city, and calling attention to the fact that nature has done very much to prepare a site for that work. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I present a petition of citizens of Boyd County, Nebr., praying that the homestead laws be so amended that the settlers on the lands embraced in the Great Sioux Reservation may be relieved from the payment of $1.25 per acre now required by the statute, because of the successive failure of crops in that county for several years, and because a failure to relieve the settlers from the payment would practically deprive them of their homestead interests. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Ohio, remonstrating against the introduction of military training in the public schools of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Encampment No. 124, Union Veteran Legion, State Soldiers' Home, of Erie County, Ohio, praying for the enactment of a per diem pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL. I present a communication, in the nature of a petition, from F. C. M. Boggess, of Fort Ogden, Fla., a soldier of the Mexican war, in which he states that many veterans of that war are getting old and needy and are receiving a pittance of $8 per month, while others are getting $12 and upward. The petitioner prays that Congress shall pass a bill granting an additional pension to the veterans of the Mexican war and the widows of deceased soldiers of that war. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VEST presented sundry memorials of citizens of the Fifth Ward of St. Louis, Mo., remonstrating against the appropriation of money for sectarian institutions; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GORMAN. I present a communication of Dr. Thomas Fell, president of St. John's College at Annapolis. It is addressed to me, but is intended as a petition. It prays for the passage of Senate bill No. 735, introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE], entitled "A bill to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy, etc." I move that the communication be received as a petition, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRITCHARD presented the petition of J. T. B. Hoover and sundry other citizens of Elm City, N. C., praying that Henry H. Pridgens, late private in Company G, First United States Volunteers, be restored to the pension roll at the rate of $12 per month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Julia Ann Foy, of Newbern, N. C., praying that she be restored to the pension roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented sundry petitions of citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1886, or some similar measure, requiring the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company to adopt rapid transit on its lines, and remonstrating against the extension of the tracks of that company until its existing lines are modernly equipped and operated; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment authorizing the President to appoint a consul at either Iskanderoon (Alexandretta) or Karpoot, in Turkey, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and moved that it be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1050) to grant an increase of pension to Elizabeth Deshler Whiting, widow of Lieut. Henry Whiting, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3993) granting a pension to Joseph Porter, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3749) to increase the pension of Mrs. Eunice Ida Rhoades, to report it without amendment.

I will state that a similar bill, a Senate bill, has been reported and is now on the Calendar. A written report was made with that bill, and no report will be made in this case, the House report standing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1822) for the relief of W. R. Austin & Co., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2426) to regulate the pay of noncommissioned officers in the Army, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WALTHALL. On the 10th of March the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], from the Committee to Establish the University of the United States, reported the bill (S. 1202) to establish a university of the United States. Leave was granted to file the views of the minority at a later day. This I desire to do now.

On Monday of last week, upon the application of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], it was ordered that 5,000 copies of the report of the committee be printed for the use of the Senate. It would be perhaps proper that a similar order should be made as to the views of the minority, and I ask that that be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. BATE. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the bill (S. 691) for the relief of Capt. W. M. Wallace. The committee regard the claim involved as a departmental one, and ask that it be relieved from its further consideration, that it be left with the Department for adjudication and settlement, and that, upon application, the papers in the case be transmitted to the Third Auditor of the Treasury Department.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. LINDSAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2175) granting a pension to James Loyd Young, late of Company A, Sixth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to give notice that on Thursday, the 16th instant, after the routine morning business, I shall ask the Senate to take up and consider the bill (S. 2147) establishing additional regulations concerning immigration to the United States.

Mr. NELSON. When the bill is called up, being a member of the committee, I shall ask the leave of the Senate to submit a few remarks upon it.

SOPHIA J. HAMILTON.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. I am instructed unanimously by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 569) granting a pension to Sophia J. Hamilton, widow of Charles S. Hamilton, major-general of volunteers, to report it favorably without amendment; and I ask that the bill be considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Sophia J. Hamilton, widow of the late Charles S. Hamilton, major-general of volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CATALOGUE OF AMERICAN LITERARY ASSOCIATION LIBRARY.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound, in paper covers, 25,000 additional copies of Bureau of Education Circular of Information, No. 200, Catalogue of the American Literary Association Library; 5,000 copies for the Senate, 10,000 copies for the House of Representatives, and 10,000 copies for the Bureau of Education.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR OF THE MINT.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 additional copies of the report of the Director of the Mint for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 5,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Director of the Mint.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS FOR 1894 AND 1895.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print, for distribution by the Department of State, 2,500 copies of Commercial Relations for 1894 and 1895, and (in separate form) 10,000 copies of the "Review of the world's commerce," etc., being pages 1 to 235, inclusive, of said Commercial Relations.

FIFTH INTERNATIONAL PRISON CONGRESS.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. SHERMAN on the 2d instant, reported a substitute therefor; and the substitute was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 181 of the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, being the report of the Delegates of the United States to the Fifth International Prison Congress, held at Paris, France, in July, 1895; 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for distribution by the Secretary of State.

Mr. HALE. I submit a report to accompany the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed under the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I desire an executive session for a few moments only.

Mr. VEST. I hope the Senator from Ohio will allow us to get through with the morning business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to any morning business.

Mr. TELLER. Let us get through with the morning business first.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right; I have no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 2759) to restore the pensions of widows in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2760) for the relief of the homestead settlers on that portion of the Great Sioux Reservation lying and being in the State of Nebraska, formerly in the Territory of Dakota (now State of South Dakota), and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced a bill (S. 2761) granting a pension to Gaston Higgins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2762) granting a pension to John Bailey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2763) granting a pension to Silas B. Hensley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEAR introduced a bill (S. 2764) to remove the charge of desertion against William F. Barrett, alias Frank Barrett; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2765) granting a pension to Ezra A. Miller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2766) granting a pension to Jane H. Vandever; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2768) to insure the safety of public records; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GORMAN (for Mr. GIBSON) introduced a bill (S. 2769) to permit the Pintsch Compressing Company to lay pipes in certain streets in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 2770) granting to the Yosemite Valley and Merced Railway Company a right of way over and station sites in the reservation established by an act of Congress of the United States entitled "An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations," approved October 1, 1890; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PERKINS. I present, to accompany the bill, a petition of citizens of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the passage of such a measure. I move that the petition be printed as a document and referred, with the bill, to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 2771) to provide for the construction of a public building at Somersworth, N. H.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2772) granting a pension to Lewis H. Soule; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2773) granting an increase of pension to Frederick W. Stone; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 2774) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of additional judges in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes"; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DANIEL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2775) to authorize the Herndon and Aldie Railroad to construct a bridge over the Potomac River at or below the Great Falls; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2776) for the relief of P. A. Leatherbury; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2777) to authorize the Light-House Board to pay Chamblin, Delaney & Scott the sum of $2,125; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALLEN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2778) to grant permits for the laying of pipe lines for commercial purposes in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2779) to provide for the transfer of the Fort Sidney Military Post Reserve to the State of Nebraska for educational purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced a bill (S. 2780) to make an equitable adjustment of the grants of land to the several States of the Union for State normal schools, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2781) granting a pension to Sarah E. Jenkins, daughter of Rear-Admiral Thornton A. Jenkins, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 124) to facilitate the reorganization of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company; to secure to actual settlers the right to purchase at a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre the agricultural lands within its grant, and to prohibit said company or any successor company from giving by consolidation, sale, or other corporate action control of its railroad to any corporation, company, person, or association of persons owning, operating, or controlling a parallel or competing railroad; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL-BANK RESERVES.

Mr. TELLER. I introduce a bill. It is very short, and I ask to have it read at length, after which I wish to say a word or two with reference to the bill.

The bill (S. 2767) to provide for the reserves of national banks was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all national banking associations established under the laws of the United States shall keep their reserves in their own vaults.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force thirty days from and after its passage.

SEC. 3. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the above are hereby repealed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Committee on Finance to this bill. I do not desire to take the time of the Senate except to say in a general way that there is a very general impression that the congestion of money in the Eastern cities which is complained of grows largely out of the provision of law that enables the banks all over the country to keep their reserves in the city of New York and other reserve cities. They deposit their money in those cities and draw interest on it, taking the money from the sections of country where the banks exist. I think myself that that system has been very detrimental to the honest industries of the country.

I am informed by those who are familiar with the system of doing business in the city of New York, where largely these moneys are accumulated, there being last September over $200,000,000 of this class of money then held there belonging to banks outside of the city, that the tendency is simply to increase speculation in stocks. I am told by those who I believe are correctly informed on the subject that 75 per cent of all the money loaned by national banks in the city of New York is loaned to stock brokers and stock speculators, not to legitimate business enterprises. I think we have reached a period in our history where industrial enterprises go begging for money, while stock speculations and speculations of that character find themselves accommodated at the banks.

Possibly the banks ought not to be required to keep all their money in their vaults, but I wish the committee would take this matter in hand and see whether they should not keep a large proportion of it in their vaults, and whether there is not some method to prevent the accumulation of money in the reserve cities.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to say one word on the subject which the Senator from Colorado has introduced.

We thought we had in Massachusetts the most carefully devised State banking system that ever existed in the country or anywhere in the world. I think if there is anything for which the statesmen of Massachusetts of fifty or sixty years ago deserve honor it is for the great care with which they dealt with the organization of the various business and other corporations which that State chartered and the restrictions under which they were to labor. They provided in that banking act (and it was the law until the present national banking system took its place) that no bank should pay interest on any money. The result was that what the Senator from Colorado desires to accomplish was accomplished; that is, the banks kept their deposits in their own vaults, except to the extent of a reasonable arrangement with the banks of redemption in Boston for the redemption of their bills, which they usually redeemed there and did not redeem at their own counters. The result was that the bank depended chiefly upon the local community for its custom, and, on the other hand, the customers, the manufacturers, who, in order to employ a large force of workmen, of course had to have credit and borrow money at the bank, to be repaid when they made their sales six months after, depended upon the local banks for their support. So the borrowers had for creditors persons who knew all about their solvency and their character and their importance in the community, and the banks in their turn were jealously watched by an interested community about them.

When the present banking law went into operation the national banks began to borrow money and to make deposits with each other where they could get money on interest. Then they began to pay interest on their deposits and to vie with each other in getting large deposits and in raising a little the rate of interest paid to depositors. The result was that the banks could not afford to have any idle money in their hands. Formerly the depositor who deposited without any interest of course let his money lie. It would not do any harm for the money to lie idle a little while. The effect of this change of policy has been that which the Senator from Colorado has pointed out. The banks have got to be one great money-lending syndicate association or combination, having headquarters in a few great commercial cities, lending money on concerns at an entire distance from the banks, over whom there can be no satisfactory or thorough oversight.

Then, on the other hand, the manufacturers, the merchants, the business men, do not send their notes, as they did, to the local banks in their own neighborhoods, but to the brokers in the large cities. A man in Worcester sends his paper to New York or to Boston or to Chicago. A man in Chicago sends his paper to New York or to Boston or to Philadelphia or some Eastern city. So gradually we are getting two great syndicates, one the money-borrowing combination and the other the money-lending combination, and the result is that any panic or disturbance in the money market, which before would be confined to the particular community where it arose, touches the whole system like touching a nerve of the human body and makes the country much more liable to panic.

I hope the Senator from Colorado will succeed in effecting the reform which he proposes. I wish to speak modestly on this question, for it is not within my line of special study; but I think the United States banking system ought to be amended by prohibiting the payment of interest by banks in all cases.

Mr. TELLER. I am delighted that the Senator from Massachusetts has added much more to what I said. I think with him that the evil of this accumulation results really from the payment of interest by the banks. If that could be prevented the banks would, so far as they were allowed, hold the money in their own vaults. I have on various occasions expressed to the Senate my belief that no national bank ought to pay interests on deposits. I think it is an exceedingly vicious system. When the money is deposited in the course of trade they ought to be able to hold it there subject to the right to loan it out when they can make a fair loan. When they pay interest on the loans there is a great incentive to make the loan and to make it promptly, and especially to make great loans in the cities, which are made to a class of people whom it was not intended should have the benefit of the local banks, just as the Senator from Massachusetts says.

I should like to have the Committee on Finance take up the bill and see if they can not deal with this subject in some way and remedy what I believe all admit is an evil, the congestion of our money at the great centers.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely desire to say that both the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Massachusetts are mistaken if they suppose this to be the general practice of all national banks. Every bank that I am acquainted with that is considered a sound, first-class national bank utterly refuses to pay anything on deposits. It is only here and there——

Mr. TELLER. Does not the Senator know that all the deposits from the country banks, the Western banks, which are held in New York receive interest?

Mr. MORRILL. That is true, for they always find some bank that will pay interest, but as to paying interest to individual depositors it is not the practice of our best banks.

Mr. HOAR. I do not believe there is a better set of banks on the face of the earth than the banks in the city where I dwell, a city now of 100,000 inhabitants. They are managed by safe, conservative, old-fashioned business men, such men as you would trust if you were making a will to be the guardian or trustee of your children and your wife. Every one of them pays interest on deposits. Three per cent is the ordinary rate.

Mr. MORRILL. Of individuals?

Mr. HOAR. Of individuals. Every one of them, I suppose, though I can not speak of all I can of some, sends its president or cashier or its most active director once a week to Boston, who goes around to the brokers' shops and says, "What paper have you got in this morning?" and he looks it over. Occasionally they go to New York.

Mr. PEFFER. For what length of time?

Mr. HOAR. As I said, I do not know about all of them, but I suppose every one of them receives a visit from the agent of some New York or Boston broker, certainly from some Boston broker, once or twice a week, and you will find in the paper laid before them——

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question before the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. It is on the reference of a bill, as I understand, and it is a debatable question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The debate is proceeding on the reference of the bill introduced by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLEN. I was not aware that the question had been submitted.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose under the rules the reference of a bill is a debatable question.

Mr. ALLEN. I rise to morning business, which I desire to transact.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has been recognized.

Mr. HOAR. I have but one word more to say. Every one of those receives its visit, and you will find on those brokers' lists the paper of Chicago houses, New York houses, houses in Maine, manufacturing establishments, paper from all over the country. That is, of course, the business of moderate, well-managed, conservative banks, and it is an absolute necessity in the existing condition.

Mr. PEFFER. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida will state his question of order.

Mr. CALL. The bill has already been referred, I understand. The Senate yesterday agreed by unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the routine business this morning the joint resolution relative to Cuba should come up and that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] should have the floor upon it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. I rose to speak upon the question of the reference of the bill as I understood it. I rose as soon as the question was proposed. Is not that question debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it is a debatable question. The Chair has not examined the rule, but it is the impression of the Chair that it is debatable, and the Chair for that purpose recognized the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CALL. I understand that the bill has been referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was introduced. It has not yet been referred. The bill will now be referred to the Committee on Finance.

MISSOURI RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. ALLEN. I introduce a joint resolution calling for an estimate to be made by the War Department for the repairing of the Missouri River bank on the west or Nebraska side opposite Sioux City, Iowa. I desire to make just a word of explanation before introducing the joint resolution. The bank at that point has caved in and destroyed much valuable property, and it needs repairing. I am informed that the proper information can not be obtained by the War Department without the passage of the joint resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be put upon its passage.

The joint resolution (S. R. 123) directing the Secretary of War to submit a plan and estimate for the improvement of the Nebraska side of the Missouri River, opposite Sioux City, Iowa, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause to be prepared and submit a plan and estimate for the improvement of the Nebraska side of the Missouri River, opposite Sioux City, Iowa, in accordance with the report of Capt. H. F. Hodges, Corps of Engineers, dated November 16, 1894, and printed in House Executive Document No. 48, Fifty-third Congress, third session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. PRITCHARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALTHALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BACON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HILL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAKER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

STATE CLAIMS.

Mr. TURPIE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, requested to report to the Senate what States, under the act of Congress of July 27, 1861, entitled "An act to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States," and the joint resolution of March 8, 1862, explanatory thereof, have filed claims in the Treasury Department for interest, discount, and exchange paid by said States upon moneys raised by said States for and expended in raising, equipping, and putting into the field troops in defense of the Union; what are the amounts of such claims; what action has been had thereon by the said Department, and the grounds for such action and the date thereof.

HEIRS OF GOTTLIEB C. GRAMMER.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the claim of the heirs of Gottlieb C. Grammer, late of the District of Columbia, deceased, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims to find and report the facts in the case as provided in the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman Act, as the same is amended by section 14 of "An act to provide for bringing suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5363) authorizing the construction of a fog signal on the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 1247) to establish and provide for the maintenance of a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia, agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. POWERS, Mr. MILNES, and Mr. BABCOCK managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 136) granting an increase of pension to Horace Townsend;

A bill (S. 344) granting a pension to Mary A. Hall;

A bill (S. 345) granting a pension to Catherine R. Jardine, widow of Brig. Gen. Edward Jardine;

A bill (S. 507) to pension Mollie Crandall;

A bill (S. 640) to increase the pension of Joseph W. Fisher;

A bill (S. 894) granting a pension to Nancy G. Allabach;

A bill (S. 1271) granting a pension to Elizabeth Moore English;

A bill (S. 2132) for the relief of settlers upon lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 116) authorizing the Public Printer to print the Annual Report of the Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in quarto form, and to bind it in one volume.

CHATTAHOOCHEE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the joint resolution relative to Cuba be taken up, that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] may address the Senate.

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Senator from Indiana to yield to me a few minutes that I may call up the bill (H. R. 6996) to authorize the construction of a wagon and foot bridge across the Chattahoochee River at or near the city of Columbia, Ala.

Mr. TURPIE. Will it lead to any debate?

Mr. PUGH. No debate.

Mr. TURPIE. Very well.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 4, after the word "Alabama," to strike out "its successors or assigns"; so as to read:

That the city of Columbia, a municipal corporation under the laws of Alabama, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge for the passage of vehicles of all kinds, animals, and foot passengers across the Chattahoochee River at or near the city of Columbia, so as to connect with Georgia on the opposite shore.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 11, after the word "spans," to strike out "and" and insert "Provided also, That if said bridge shall be built with unbroken and continuous spans"; so as to read:

Provided, That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may be built as a drawbridge, or with unbroken and continuous spans: Provided also, That if said bridge shall be built with unbroken and continuous spans it shall give a clear headroom of not less than 55 feet above high-water mark, as the same shall be fixed and determined by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 20, after the word "further," to insert:

That if the Secretary of War shall decide that navigation will not be injured thereby the draw may be built with one span of 100 feet clear width of opening over the main navigable channel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

GETTYSBURG NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg leave to call up the bill (S. 2490) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a national park at Gettysburg, Pa.," approved on the 11th day of February, 1895. It is a matter of current business relating to the Gettysburg Park, and it is needed. It will take no time, and there will be no objection, I think.

Mr. CALL. I will remind the Senator from Connecticut that by unanimous consent the Cuban resolution is to be taken up, and the Senator from Indiana proposes to address the Senate upon it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg pardon. I wish the Senator from Indiana would yield for this matter of business. It will take but a moment.

Mr. TURPIE. The Senator from Indiana will ask the Senator from Connecticut how long the bill will take, and whether it will lead to any debate.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill I speak of will take about three minutes.

Mr. TURPIE. I yield for that purpose.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all from the enacting clause down to line 20, in the following words:

That section 4 of the act entitled "An act to establish a national park at Gettysburg, Pa.," approved on the 11th day of February, 1895, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to acquire, at such times and in such manner as he may deem best calculated to serve the public interest, such lands in the vicinity of Gettysburg, Pa., not exceeding in area the parcels shown on the map prepared by Maj. Gen. Daniel E. Sickles, United States Army, and now on file in the office of the Secretary of War, which were occupied by the infantry, cavalry, and artillery on the 1st, 2d, and 3d days of July, 1863; and such other adjacent lands as he may deem necessary to preserve the important topographical features of the battlefield, and in his discretion to improve and maintain the public roads within the limits of said park, jurisdiction over which—

And to insert:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized in his discretion to improve and maintain the public roads within the limits of the national park at Gettysburg, Pa., over which jurisdiction—

So as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized in his discretion to improve and maintain the public roads within the limits of the national park at Gettysburg, Pa., over which jurisdiction has been or may hereafter be ceded to the United States: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be deemed and held to prejudice the rights acquired by any State or by any military organization to the ground on which its monuments or markers are placed nor the right of way to the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of War to improve and maintain the public roads within the limits of the national park at Gettysburg, Pa."

CLIFTON R. ANDERSON.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask the Senator from Indiana to yield to me that I may call for the consideration of House bill 6425.

Mr. TURPIE. Will it lead to debate?

Mr. LINDSAY. I think not. If it does I will withdraw it.

Mr. TURPIE. I will yield to the Senator from Kentucky; but I give notice that this is the last consent I shall give. I think it is necessary in order to observe the understanding that I should proceed.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6425) for the relief of Clifton R. Anderson.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Clifton R. Anderson, of Danville, Ky., $46.09, the amount he was required to pay to the United States Government, burglars having, without any fault or negligence of his, broken into his office while he was a stamp deputy in the United States Revenue Service and carried away that amount, which belonged to the United States Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senate to take up the joint resolution relative to Cuba which lies on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution (S. R. 119) relative to the putting to death of prisoners of war in Cuba, and providing for intervention by the United States, if necessary, on which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CALL. By the leave of the Senate, I present two communications, which I send to the desk, and which I ask may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the communications, but before concluding was interrupted by

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the communications sent to the desk by the Senator from Florida may be printed in the RECORD without further reading, and that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] may be permitted to proceed with his speech.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

The papers are as follows:

From La Atalaya, a Spanish paper published in Santander, dated February 5, 1896, we translate the following lines of its editorial that give a just measure of Spanish ideas and what they understand by civilized warfare:

"Extermination!—this is the only solution of the Cuban war.

"Let our romantic neighbors, the American people, pity whom they may in their hypocritical defense of the rebels. It matters not what all America will say, the time has arrived for us to be cruel, inexorable, bloodthirsty, if necessary. And no matter what may come of it, public opinion, nay, the entire nation, demands that the insurrection be quenched in lakes of blood. Not one against whom the slightest suspicion is entertained should be spared. Nothing should deter us. That Cuban soil belongs to us, and if peace in future must rest on mountains of corpses, let us in haste lay the bloody foundation!"

Yours, respectfully,

——— ———.

By American citizen and merchant of Habana at Key West.

——— ———.

To the honorable Senator, Mr. CALL:

HONORABLE SIR: The Spanish authorities are striving to make the United States believe that in the war which they wage against those who aspire to the independence of our country they never have used means condemned by civilized nations; and this is completely false. Many are the crimes which have been committed and are daily committed by the said authorities, its myrmidons, and the Spanish troops, and in order that you shall be acquainted with some of them, and in order that you shall make use of them when you shall deem it proper, I send you the following facts:

The Spanish colonel, Luis Molina, defeated by the Cuban brigadier Lacret, near the Hanabana River, to obtain his revenge shot, in the farm Cayo Espino, 37 innocent persons, among them some Chinamen, and two women and three girls were wounded. The brother of one of the victims denounced the crime to Gen. Martinez Campos; some newspapers gave it to the public; but instead of punishing the said chief, he was rewarded with a cross for having assassinated innocent and defenseless beings.

The same Colonel Molina had a colored employee of Enrique de Armas, a resident of the Santa Elena plantation, situated in Pedroso, province of Matanzas, serve him as guide for his column to a Cuban hospital which was in the farm Manjuari. When the Spaniards arrived at this place they assassinated the 14 wounded, and they did the same thing with the negro because he had not gone spontaneously to denounce the existence of the hospital to the Spanish authorities. This occurrence has been publicly related by a soldier of the column, who boasted of the feat.

The Spanish colonel, Ricardo Vicuña, when his column passed by the cattle ranch La Montana, property of Felipe Gastañaga and Calixto Olano, in Guira de Macuriges, province of Matanzas, exchanged shots with some revolutionists who were in ambush, and afterwards continued his march to the buildings of the said ranch, and on arriving did not find any of the inmates there. Toward evening the person in charge, with his wife and children, came; and on being asked by Vicuña why they had left the houses, he answered that he had gone to the woods with his family to save himself from the bullets which crossed them very near during the skirmish with the insurgents. This was sufficient cause to take away the man, tied, without paying attention to the entreaties of his wife and children, and at a short distance, in the road of Vista Alegre, he shot him and two other men who had families, and as innocent as this one. The unfortunate widow had to suffer her misery in silence, for she has been threatened with death, as well as her children, if she takes any steps to throw light on this occurrence.

The said Vicuña shoots all peaceful country people that he meets; he sets fire to the houses, and without any scruple communicates to his superiors that he has had a battle, causing deaths to the enemy, which deaths are none other than the said murders. Some few days ago in an excursion in Corral Falso, province of Matanzas, he shot 13 defenseless farmers so as not to be obliged to pay for the cattle which he had taken for his troops.

The Spanish lieutenant, Luciano Cossio, who has been many times accused of stealing cattle before the Spanish judges of Matanzas, arrived with his soldiers at the sugar plantation Carmen de Hernandez, situated in the district of Sabanilla, province of Matanzas, and there shot 11 farm hands of the plantation whom he found at work, afterwards ordering an employee of the said plantation to bury the victims.

A Cuban column occupied the town of Sabanilla, province of Matanzas. When it left some Spanish soldiers came out of their hiding places and assassinated 32 persons, among them 17 women, for the mere fact of being Cubans.

On the 24th of this month of February some Spanish guerrillas were bringing a colored man to Matanzas, because he would not give a sum of money demanded. While passing the River San Juan he was thrown, securely bound, into the river, and he was afterwards reported as having committed suicide. All this and much more is being done by order of the Spanish governors, and especially of General Weyler, a most cruel and sanguinary man, who, during the last war, not only did he kill prisoners, but a multitude of old people, women, and children. To make believe that his conduct has changed he takes care that no prisoners are shot in the cities; instead he has them shot in the country. Those who submit themselves to a court-martial are not sentenced to death, but in return he gives secret orders to his columns of operations to kill all the pacific or noncombatant Cuban farmers found in the country. The prisoners are put to death very quietly and then announced as cases of suicide, or else they explain the death of the prisoners with evasive answers, and in other cases they say the prisoners have been put at liberty, and they do not know where the prisoners have gone. With this I send a copy of the Correo de Matanzas, an official newspaper, giving the official news of the supposed suicides of political prisoners in the city of Santa Clara. In said newspaper is also inserted or published official dispatches of a battle in which Lieutenant Cossio says that numerous insurgents were killed, but everyone here knows that to prove his story he had to kill every peaceful citizen found on his way.

The houses of the American citizen Don Francisco Garcia Valenti were burned by order of said Lieutenant Cossio, in order to punish Mr. Garcia because the Cuban patriots had stopped there, as if Mr. Garcia could possibly have impeded their stay at his houses, a thing which the Spanish columns themselves can not do. Lieutenant Cossio also fired the cane fields of the plantations Ojo de Agua and San Ignacio in order to surround the insurgent forces which were marching quietly to their camp or destination, and in the official dispatches, without any scruples, said Lieutenant Cossio imputed to the insurgents the firing of the sugar fields and houses.

It is also assured that General Prats has shot many peaceful farmers in the Valley of Guamacato, destroying afterwards their crops and houses.

If secret and direct orders are given to the American consul in Matanzas so that he may privately and secretly investigate the truthfulness of what I have said, the American Government could acquire confirmation of all I say in this letter.

Sir, the most evident proof that General Weyler has been sent to this island to exterminate the Cuban people, killing not only the prisoners of war but also the peaceful inhabitants who remain in their houses, whether in towns or the country—the proof is to be found in the papers I send, a thoroughly Spanish paper, published in Madrid, and entitled La Lectuta Dominical, of January 26, so that you will be informed of what it says in its "Cronica semanal" (weekly record); and as this is written by a Spanish resident in Madrid, nobody can accuse it of partiality.

The Cubans hope that you will come out victorious in the noble, honest, and humanitarian campaign that you are carrying on, for your glory and that of the great nation of which you are a son and worthy representative, and for the welfare of so many beings who are already grateful to you and who will know how to perpetuate your memory generation after generation.

It is a gentleman who writes to you, and on his honor and on the sacred Scriptures swear that all this is absolutely true.

May God grant you health and good fortune.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, the joint resolution introduced by the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] is the first parliamentary movement addressed to the action of both Houses of Congress in relation to a subject of increasing importance and interest. I have no doubt that it represents the opinion of a very large section of people in the quarter of the Union in which the honorable and learned Senator from Florida resides, an opinion much to be heeded in the consideration of this question, because the people of Florida are nearest the seat of war, they are nearest the fire, and they are entitled to hold and express their own views as to how the conflagration may be best extinguished or in what methods the danger and injury to the vicinity and neighborhood threatened may be prevented.

I think also that this resolution is full of meaning; it comprises a plenary significance when taken in connection with the very remarkable vicissitudes, the phenomenal changes of front and base, which have befallen the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. SHERMAN] and the learned and honorable junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in their joint conduct of the Cuban campaign up to this date.

The principal operative section of this joint resolution is one of interposition. There is a precedent for this policy in the action of the last Administration. One of the main sections of the joint resolution proposes that a detachment of the United States Navy shall be sent down to Cuban waters for the purpose of protecting neutrals and neutral rights during the prosecution of the civil war there, now so unhappily existing. It will be recollected that during the prosecution of the war in Chile between Balmaceda and the opposing party there was a detachment of the Pacific Squadron sent to that coast; that it lay off and on; two vessels went to the capital of Chile, anchored in the harbor, and lay there for months in the very sight and seat of active hostilities. They did not fire a gun, but their presence afforded a very necessary protection not only to our own citizens but to all the neutrals who were there engaged in business who had not a military or naval representation at the theater of war. In the same way here, I see nothing improper in the suggestion to the Executive that an armed vessel should be sent, perhaps more than one, into Cuban waters, into the harbor of Habana, upon the same errand and for the same purpose.

This resolution of the honorable and learned Senator from Florida was introduced before the report of the late committee of conference. This resolution is a growth; it is the effect, therefore, of the anxiety and unrest in the country which has been produced by the condition of helpless inertia or delay, of inaction, of altogether irrational obstruction existing in the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations ever since he took refuge in the crypt of the joint committee of conference upon this question, from which he barely escaped the day before yesterday as if by fire, after much importunity and after very labored supplication to be rid of his former action. This condition was superinduced by the levity of assent of the right honorable chairman and his willingness to listen to the jingo jargon of that class of extremists so ably represented here by the gifted junior Senator from Massachusetts, a Senator singularly gifted with the power to clothe an interesting and exciting subject with all the dullness of time-worn commonplace and stilted platitude.

It was by reason of this inaction and the impatience bred by it that resolutions similar to this are now being presented and will be presented for our careful consideration. Had there been unanimity, had there been anything like promptness and celerity, had there been a real effort made to report the original resolutions of the Senate, had there not been an unconditional surrender in the first place to the demands of their opponents, this resolution and many others would have rested in the breast of the people who had prompted it, and the country would have been satisfied with a direct, complete, and immediate legislative expression of Congress upon this subject. I trace directly to this inaction and to this obstruction—for that is what it substantially amounts to—I trace to this inaction and obstruction such further consideration as may be given to the Cuban question during the present session.

It is impossible to conceive of a more wholly unlegislative proceeding, of a more abnormal proceeding, than the action taken by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations with reference to the Cuban question. Firstly, the honorable chairman came in with the original Senate resolutions; secondly, the honorable chairman came here abandoning those resolutions and proposing the resolutions of the House, especially the third article, concerning intervention; thirdly—and I wish I could say lastly, but there is no telling what will be lastly in this category—thirdly, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations abandoned the third article, abandoned the House resolutions, and returned again to the original overtures made in this body. I think there could not have been a more unfortunate disposition in respect to the advocacy of this measure than befell it when it suffered from the inaction and the reaction alike of the honorable chairman.

One very notable thing in the joint resolution introduced by the honorable and learned Senator from Florida is the boldness, the frankness, the freedom of expression which characterizes it. It contains a plain statement of this suggested policy to the Executive. It does not contain a double entendre like the favored resolution of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. It contains nothing lying in ambush and concealment. It is not proposed by the honorable Senator from Florida to aid the Cuban cause by any sort of equivocation or prevarication. There is a plain statement here of the necessity of interposition. It is a measure of interposition such as we took in the case of Chile, such as is advised here now—not intervention. Interposition is an interfering act by a third party in favor of neutrals and in favor of the rights, property, and interests of neutrals, such as has already been mentioned in this discussion. Intervention is an interfering act by a third party in the principal quarrel upon one side or the other.

The most remarkable omission in the third resolution of the report of the committee of conference, on which the Senate and the country were delayed day after day, is that, although it italicises intervention in two most important places in that third resolution, it does not say upon which side we shall intervene. I have the text of it. It is not said in that resolution upon which side we shall intervene. The causes and the reasons why we should intervene are given in the resolution. They are the needs of commerce; they are the wants of trade; they are the legitimate property interests; they are the same reasons which a peddler would give for depositing his pack in a place of safety. The reasons are plain enough; but it is not stated in the text of the resolution whether the honorable chairman desired to interfere for the purpose of reestablishing Spanish authority in Cuba, or whether he desired to intervene for the purpose of aiding the free Republic of Cuba. For my part, when the time comes for intervention, I am in favor of intervening on the side of Cuban freedom and independence for the sake of freedom and independence, and for no other reason or cause.

Mr. President, since last February the civil war in Cuba has been in the twelfth year of its duration. The long continuance of hostilities is itself a fact, a controlling fact, in determining the question of belligerency, because although it was said the other day by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts who sits nearest to me [Mr. HOAR] that no amount of fighting would alone justify the declaration of a condition of belligerency, and although that must be conceded by the well-settled principles of international law, yet when the armed contest has lasted year after year the presumption arises with great force, and is almost inevitable, that beside and behind those fighting there is a people, a political and social organism, that comprises resources and territory, competent to take upon themselves the discharge of the functions and duties of a new nationality. And when the duration of the war is considered in reference to other circumstances which I shall notice in the sequel, it becomes an established certainty that the condition of belligerency exists at this time in Cuba.

I recollect very well hearing the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations asked as to what amount of fighting, if any mere fighting, would authorize the declaration of a condition of belligerency. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations made no reply—none whatever. He did not even consider that learned inquiry submitted by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] upon the third article, or the very earnest questions of other Senators in this Chamber with respect to a condition of belligerency.

I have heard the twenty or thirty addresses made in this Chamber by the junior Senator from Massachusetts. I have heard the somewhat less number of remarks made by the learned chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have heard all those remarks with fixed attention, with unfaltering earnestness, with full sympathy, until he fled into the cave of Adullam; and yet I have never heard a word from the Senator with respect to the reasons why a condition of belligerency now exists, or why we ought to recognize it, or why even an expression of opinion is competent upon that subject. All that may be summarized from the addresses of the junior Senator from Massachusetts—and I use the word with some particularity because I think the word "remarks" is too colloquial an expression to be used as applying to anything emanating from such a high source—all that may be summarized from the numerous addresses of the junior Senator from Massachusetts and from the remarks of the senior Senator from Ohio is that there is war in Cuba, and great is the Cuban question. There is a way, to all appearances, of lessening even the greatest question by the method of its handling, the method of its presentation. Sometimes a wholly unimportant and indifferent figure will thrust itself into the foreground of a great scene, a great drama. You go there to take a look; nothing is visible; there is nothing to be seen except the ever-shifting and shadowy silhouette of the irrepressible marplot. Again, sir, the eye may become suddenly suffused, covered as with a cataract, afflicted with a total loss of vision. After a brief examination you discover the whole trouble arises from an insect on the eyelash. [Laughter.]

I spoke deliberately with respect to the Cuban war being in its twelfth year. This is now the second period of the civil war. It is like the Silesian war waged by the great Frederick. Between the first and second periods of the Silesian war there was an interval of peace for several years, just as in this case. The Silesian war was one between the same parties, upon the same question, having for its purpose the same object, the retention by the House of Austria, on the one hand, and the acquisition by Prussia, on the other, of the provinces of Upper and Lower Silesia. So here, sir, the present Cuban revolution first became flagrant in 1868. The first period of the war lasted ten years, until 1878. It was then concluded by what is called the treaty of pacification. Ten years were allowed by the terms of that treaty to carry into effect the reforms demanded by the Cuban people. They waited seven years after the expiry of the ten years, and war, last February a year, broke out again; the same war, between the same parties, having for its object the same purpose—on the one hand the reestablishment of Spanish authority in the island, and on the other the creation of a new republic, that form of government to which the Cuban people give and have given not only their assent, but their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor in its support.

But, sir, it will be recollected that at the close of the first period of the war there was not a suppression of the rebellion, as we call it in this country, not by any means. There was no transaction like that which occurred at Yorktown, when the military forces of the old government surrendered to those of the new; there was no transaction like that which occurred at Appomattox, when the military forces of the revolution surrendered to those of the old government. There was first a truce, and then a cessation of hostilities in virtue of a compact between the leaders of the Cuban revolution—between the officers of the Cuban Republic—and those representing the Spanish Crown. Even then, in 1878, these parties, the officers of the Spanish Crown and the officers of the Cuban Republic, met on equal grounds for the conclusion of that treaty. Both acknowledged each other as belligerents even then; both met as independent parties and as independent nationalities, and entered into a condition of compact upon compliance with which Cuba should remain subject to the Spanish Government; upon violation of which the revolution was again renewed.

That compact, that treaty of pacification, had five principal stipulations: First, the emancipation of slavery in the island. That has been accomplished. Second, a universal amnesty, an amnesty granted by both sides for all offenses during the war; not an amnesty granted only by the Spanish Government to such as had borne arms or given aid and comfort to its enemies, but an amnesty granted also by the free Republic of Cuba, at that time in arms, pardoning all those who had borne arms against the Republic or had given their enemies aid and comfort. A dual amnesty is contained in the terms of this treaty of pacification.

There were three other principal stipulations. One was that there should be an autonomous legislature chosen by the people of Cuba for the conduct of the civil affairs and government of that island. Another was that the taxation, all taxes levied in Cuba, should be levied by virtue of its own legislature, and all expenditures made in Cuba should be made by virtue of the same legislative action.

The third was that of official equality; that is, Cubans should have the same right and privilege as Spaniards of holding all the offices of trust, profit, or emolument within the island. These were the three principal stipulations made on behalf of the revolutionists at that time, on which conditions the peace was made and the signatory parties thereto put their hands and seals.

It is now claimed by the revolutionists that these stipulations have been violated, wholly broken by Spain. I believe the claim to be just and well founded. I heard the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] the other day asking in his very thoughtful way whether, in the first place, it was a fact that these stipulations in the treaty existed; asking next whether it was a fact that the Spanish Government had violated these stipulations. The answer to that is that both these things are facts. When men take the field, with arms in their hands, asserting a claim, maintaining its truth and justice, you can not reply to them with words. There is only one way to deny the truth, to deny the justice, of what is claimed. That, sir, is the wager of battle. I myself never saw the slightest constitutional justification for what was called the right of secession; I never could perceive the slightest justification or apology for what was called the exercise of that right; but when thousands of men with arms in their hands asserted that it was a right and that the time had come for its exercise, there was but one way to meet that assertion—the arbitrament of the sword, a jurisdiction in which there is no change of venue. The same state of facts, the same state of claims, exists in the Island of Cuba to-day.

Now, sir, with respect to the geographical division of the island, occasioned by the revolutionary movement, it is the same to-day, on the 8th of April, 1896, as it was in 1878, as it was in 1868, when the revolution first became flagrant. The island is 700 miles in length. Two-thirds of the island, about 450 miles, are within the territorial limits of the revolutionists. Next to that there is about a half of the remaining third, very fertile, held for the most part in large plantations, which has been the debatable land, where most of the battles and skirmishes have occurred. The remaining portion in the eastern part of the island is a rim, so to speak, around cities—Habana—and others in that part of the island of perhaps 15 or 20 miles, which is actually within the military encampments of the Spanish power, and therefore subject to their authority.

What, therefore, is the condition of that portion of Cuba—two-thirds of the island within the territorial lines of the republic? That was a question asked by Senators here in the debate; it was asked of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The honorable chairman never devoted one moment to the consideration of it. He seemed to be as afraid to come up to this part of the territory held by the Cuban revolutionists as General Weyler would be himself. [Laughter.] He never even looked over the fence at the field. I propose, sir, to go into this territory and, as far as our means of intelligence can be used, to take an impartial and fair survey of its condition—its condition now and its condition as compared with that heretofore.

We have meager means of intelligence. The data to which I shall refer are only those which may come to us—we have no other—through the means of our own correspondent, our special correspondent, our staff correspondent, messages, letters, and other documents of that nature; and yet I think they show sufficient details to give us a true idea of the condition of the country within the revolutionary lines. We must depend upon those minute men of the press, those sentinels always on the skirmish line of intelligence, having no interest in this case at least—so far as concerns their use of data—having no interest except to state the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

The data to which I shall refer are not related to battles, to seiges, to escapes. They are data of such every-day, familiar, and homely character that they have even escaped the Spanish sieve of espionage upon the telegraph and post-office. They are therefore to be taken with more probative force against the Spanish case. They are confessions by the Spanish authority that this condition exists and that it justifies not only the opinion but the declaration of belligerency in this instance.

Now, sir, I noticed several instances—I will use the word "several" here—in the beginning of the war, in the first few months of the war, military incursions into the territory of the rebels, as they are called. I noticed that in several of those cases they captured the prefecto, the alcalde, the rebel minor officer of justice, as they call him. I noticed one instance in which they captured the justice of the peace, as I am going to call him. He is a Cuban officer resembling that officer in jurisdiction. They captured the justice, the witnesses, the parties, the whole court, and took them before a Spanish court-martial; we have not heard of any habeas corpus in that instance. I do not know what their future fortunes were.

Again, I noticed one instance of a raid of that kind where they captured a public building. It was not at all a provincial capital, or a capital of the island or anything adjoining it. It was a building like one of our county court-houses. They captured a public building. They killed some of the officials occupying it and they drove the rest away. They took the books and papers and searched them. The Spanish officer reserved those which he thought would be useful to his Government. The other books and papers of the public building were carried out into the street and burned. That was a building having reference to the administration of justice within the rebel lines, as they are called—having reference to the local administration of justice in that territory. I must conceive, everyone must conceive, simply from reading those accounts that within that territory there is a regular administration of local justice.

I think, sir, that the condition of the territory is very much like that of the colonies during our own Revolutionary war. The local courts, the orphans' court, the courts of ordinary civil and criminal jurisdiction, unless absolutely interrupted by incursions of the enemy, were all in full operation during that war. There are even some records of them. But the higher courts were not held. Why? Because the judges were uniformly Tories. They were appointees of the Crown. Many of them were not safe within their own jurisdiction or circuit. They therefore fled from the places where their courts were held into the cities or British garrisons; and one of the best books written concerning the internal condition of the colonies during that time was written by a colonial judge who in some way made his escape to London and stayed there as a pensioner of the Crown for the whole of his natural life, and never returned to his jurisdiction in the United States, to the country of his birth; for he was a native American—born here, reared here, professionally educated here. Yet he found it impossible during the war, being a judge of an appellate superior court, to get records, to have parties before him, or to hold his jurisdiction, on account of the sympathy which he had with the royal cause, and for the reason that the royal cause did not have force enough to give effect to his decrees and judgments.

That is the precise condition of affairs within the limits of the Cuban Republic. I therefore take it for granted, not because it is so stated, but by reason of the data to which I have called attention, that the passage of the proclamation of President Cisneros, the President of the Cuban Republic, dated at Cubitas, February 1, 1896, which reads as follows—

> The Cuban republican government of the island is a firmly established institution. Covering considerably over one-half of the area is the civil branch of our authority, with regularly appointed governors of different sections and prefectos in the subdivisions—is true in substance and matter of fact.

I go on now to consider some other data. I kept a tally of one sort of Spanish military incursions which occurred in the early months of the war, and even now occur, but not so often—those military raids which had for their object the looting of the country stores, the country store that always has been a favorite object of that kind of attack. I have even some personal knowledge of it, for it will be recollected, sir, that we had what I have sometimes called the Anabasis of Morgan into Indiana. It was a very frequent incident for them to make those attacks. I kept a tally of those until they amounted to 20 separate instances of raids upon country stores within the Cuban revolutionary area. In one of the instances it was related that the keeper of the store was shot down in his door for no cause except refusing to answer questions of the Spanish officer. In several, in too many of those military raids, it was noted that the women and children of the village had been removed to a place of safety, very valuable data, indicating, in the first place, that there are places of safety which the Spanish army can not or dare not attack; and, in the next place, that peculiar mode of warfare which in the absence of battles, in the absence of siege, in the absence of resistance, yet threatens danger to women and children. I have read of many of those raids, sir, made during the late civil war in our country. I never knew or heard of an instance upon either side where the life of a child or the life or honor of a woman was endangered in such a raid.

The raids of the Spanish military have had sometimes the looting of the country stores for an object, and sometimes they take them by way of an incident, being in the line of march or in return. But whatever their objects may have been and no matter in what degree they were accomplished, I am not standing upon the highly colored statement—if some Senators may wish to call it such—that the storekeeper was shot down in his own door. It is wholly immaterial in considering the question of belligerency whether there were women and children who were removed to a place of safety. It may seem inhuman to say so, but what the dispatches do show is that the country store is an institution within the lines of the Republic of Cuba; that these institutions are well known and numerous. If I were called upon to-day to name the type of superior civilization, not a superior type of civilization, but to name the type of superior civilization most universal, I should designate the country store. You will find them, sir, in sight of this Capitol, in Maryland, in Virginia; you will find them in Ohio, in Indiana, in the transmississippi States, in New Mexico, in old Mexico, in the West India Islands, in old Spain. All over, wherever civilization obtains, you will find this same type, consisting of the same details. And what does its existence indicate? There are two well-known characters who frequent the country store. They are constant and perpetual customers of the country store—the debtor and creditor. They can not live in a country without law. They can not breathe in a territory without law any more than a school of shad could live in a stubble field. The fact is convincing; it is beyond doubt.

One of the theories offered is that the eastern end of the Island of Cuba, that which is the territorial situs of the Republican Government, is a mere wilderness, full of dens, caves, holes in the earth, where wretched banditti robbers take refuge and sally out on the Spanish soldiery when favorable opportunity occurs. The existence of the country store means that there are no thieves, or that the thieves have been overawed or punished. The existence of the country store means that there are no burglars, no robbers, or that they have been overawed or punished. I know it may be said "it is impossible that the country stores should carry on much business in such a warlike condition as Cuba is now in. It is impossible that debtor and creditor should have any attention paid to them. The man must sell for cash if he sells at all. Certainly he could not trust anyone; or he is perhaps a man who keeps a stock of merchandise and exchanges it only for country produce." But how does that help the other side of the case? What man would sell his goods for cash, and keep cash where the law of the country was theft; where the government of the country was larceny; where the civil administration of the country was overrun by armed marauders? What man would keep a stock of goods for exchange under like circumstances? No, sir; the instance is crucial. There must be within the territorial lines of the Republic of Cuba an organization of law, of order, a civilization defined to be the art of living together in peaceable society under regular political rule.

There are other data to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. In some of the Spanish military incursions into the territory of the Republic there were certain priests taken prisoners, and in some of the battles there were certain priests taken prisoners, priests who were accompanying what they call the rebel regiments, the rebel bands, as chaplains, to administer to the sick, to care for the wounded, and to soothe the dying. Those chaplains were not dealt with like the alcalde. They were not looted like the country store. It will be seen in all the accounts that they were very highly favored captives. They were put under strict military surveillance, but they were not imprisoned; they were not bound; they were not shackled. They were respected just for what they were—priests. They belonged to a kingdom not of this world, but very closely related to this world. They were subjects of a power before which the power of the Spanish monarchy quailed in meek subjection.

I noticed about four weeks ago—I have no doubt other Senators noticed the same thing—that the present captain-general of Cuba made a pause in his campaign, not so long as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations made in his [laughter], but he made a pause in that campaign carried on under all the rules and regulations of an Apache or a Comanche chief, in that campaign of the Mafia and the thug; in that campaign, an imitation of the Duke of Alva, forever infamous in the Netherlands, to be followed by the same result. The Netherlands were lost to Spain. Cuba will be lost to Spain. I retract the "will be." Cuba is lost to Spain, irrecoverably lost. There is no more chance on the present face of things for the reestablishment of the authority of the Spanish Government in the Island of Cuba than there is for the reestablishment of French dominion in San Domingo; and the parallel is a very close one geographically; still closer in various instances which I shall give in the sequel.

But the captain-general made the pause about four weeks ago, long enough to indite a special proclamation to the priests resident within the rebel lines—they were a numerous body, numerous enough to be made the subject of a special proclamation—offering to those clerics a full amnesty for all offenses, for all the aid and comfort they had given to the Republic of Cuba, to the revolutionists, and they were not required to report at Habana, not even at a provincial capital. They were required to report only to the nearest Spanish post, to take the oath of allegiance to the Crown of Spain, and to give their parole, their verbal parole, that they would not return to their people within the rebel lines. That is the substance of the proclamation.

I wish to state now as throwing great light upon the condition of the territory within the lines of the republic that not a single priest has taken advantage of this proclamation. But although these priests, sir, are not amenable either to the military or civil authority of Spain, they are amenable to their own superiors, the metropolitan of Habana or whoever may be in the chief ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the island; and if those priests were attending upon mere bands of robbers, murderers, and marauders; if they were pretending only to be chaplains and really were not such; if they were waiting simply as servants upon bands engaged in arson, in murder, in robbery, not regularly enlisted in public military service, it would not have been twenty-four hours after their capture till they would have been unfrocked and delivered over as laymen to the tender mercies of a Spanish court-martial.

There is still an important deduction to be drawn from these data. Wherever there is a priest there is a parish; wherever there is a parish there are people, men, women, and children; wherever there are people there is a church, in which mass is heard, in which offerings are given, in which all the rites and ceremonies of that faith to which Cubans of all parties have been so long steadfast are duly observed. It is abundant proof of the condition of this territory to know that there are priests there, members of this sacred and powerful hierarchy, who in their civil character are now to be considered as citizens of the revolutionary republic of Cuba and as the enemies of Spain. Why was amnesty offered to them? Because they had offended the Spanish Government. Why have they not accepted it? Because they owe and maintain their allegiance to the government of the Republic of Cuba.

I have gone, sir, still further into the question of condition. I have examined Cuban statistics. I find that in 1880, two years after the close of the first period of the Cuban war, exports from Cuba had slightly decreased. In imports there was a very large decrease, showing that the people had become impoverished by the long continuance of the war. Population, strange to say, was the same as reported ten years before. Either there had been great exaggeration as to military losses or there had been great migration which had made them good and had restored the population of the island. In 1890, ten years afterwards, the Cuban exports were larger than ever before in the history of the island. The Cuban imports were also larger, and the population had increased 20 or 30 per cent, according to the best authority, above what it had ever been before reported. Cuban credits of the Spanish Government were quoted at par. Notwithstanding the immense expenses of the war, taxes levied for that purpose, floating debts funded, they were quoted at par and remained at par until after the commencement of the second period of war last February a year, when they sank down to 80 and remain at that point.

I think, sir, it is very evident that this two-thirds of the island is a country, is an organized government, is a political and social body, which from its maintenance of twelve years of war, if from no other reason, has earned for itself the right and title to recognition as belligerent. I am not among those who would say that our determination of this question, so unanimous and so much belated, is inconsequential or a matter of indifference. Sir, it is a matter of the highest importance, not only as influencing the action of the Executive here, but as influencing the action of foreign governments elsewhere. We can not, of course, expect immediate action on the part of the Executive. Gentlemen sometimes say that the Executive can take no official notice of the resolutions. Grant it. Is it to be supposed that the Executive is in ignorance of the passage of those resolutions or of their contents? Not at all, sir. He is well acquainted with them, and I have no doubt that he has watched every step of the deliberation. But there can be no reasonable objection, as we have been so long engaged in their consideration, to his taking an adequate portion of time. The executive department of the Government has its own conclusions to arrive at, its own sources of information, its own arguments addressed to reason, to understanding; and I make no doubt that the course of events here and elsewhere will be such as finally to result in an official recognition of belligerency between the respective parties to the war in Cuba.

Allow me to say, sir, that the offer of mediation is strictly in line with that of belligerency. A neutral may offer mediation. The day may come when, instead of being totally subjugated, the Spanish Government will be very willing to accept our mediation and to retire from the island upon some terms, instead of being driven, as the French were, into the sea.

We are told by Senators upon the other side of this question that the Republic of Cuba has an inland capital and that it has no seaport. The capital of Switzerland, the oldest republic in the world, is not a seaport. The City of Mexico is not a seaport. Caracas is not a seaport. The cases are very numerous in which capitals are wholly inland. Nor can I conceive that much importance can be attached to the retention of seaports in the islands even by Spanish garrisons.

Let us look at some other revolutions. Take the revolution in Mexico. The city of Vera Cruz, the principal seaport of that Republic, was held by the Spanish forces up to the time when independence was recognized by the home Government. What could the Mexicans do with Castle Ulloa, its bastions, its ramparts, and the wall of Vera Cruz? They had no navy any more than Montezuma had, 20 or 30 canoes; they had no method of attack, but they did surround the city as with a cordon of fire which cut it off from communication with the surrounding territory. A city does not amount to much which is thus isolated.

It is said that railroad cars are running out of Habana. So they are. They are running 15, 20, 30, and in one instance 40 miles.

How do they run? With a full military detachment on guard on the train. Who wants to travel in such a train? Freight may be sent. Who wants to send freight when within an hour the track may be torn up or a bridge subjected to destruction by dynamite?

There is a perfect isolation with respect to urban commerce and urban necessities. When it is considered that supplies, munitions of war, even food, in a few months will have to be brought across the Atlantic to support the Spanish military in that island, the burden so imposed will become insufferable. The mere holding of seaports will be no recompense.

I might allude to the circumstance of our own Revolutionary war. We had very few of the seaports. New York, then, as now, the great commercial metropolis of the country, was held by the British Government until the time of the signing of the definitive treaty of peace at Paris. It never was surrendered. They would not hear that word. But after the surrender of Cornwallis and after the treaty of peace had been signed by the commissioners of the signatory powers the British evacuated the city and harbor of New York, and in old times I have read how our people used to keep Evacuation Day as a sort of public holiday. Every seaport on the Atlantic coast south of New York was held by the royal forces. What did it avail? How much longer did it enable them to continue the struggle? How did it prevent the independence of the colonies? Let history answer.

I alluded, sir, to the instance of Santo Domingo. That was the old name of the whole island, in which there are now two independent Republics, Santo Domingo and Haiti. France once owned the most extensive and fertile colonial possessions in the West Indies with the exception of Spain. They were lost, and how? Let us recur to the beginning of the contest. What had France in that war? She had nothing but men and money. She had nothing but munitions of war in lavish abundance. She had nothing but cities and seaports and garrisons. She had nothing but fleets and armies, officered by celebrated leaders fresh from victories in European fields. What had Toussaint and his people? What had the Haitians? Any seaports? Not one. Any sympathy from any quarter? None. Any recognition of belligerency? No such thing. Any offer of mediation? Not at all. Any munitions? None except what they captured from the enemy.

What was it that supplied these defects? How did all these other things come to be added to the cause of revolution in Santo Domingo? Any treasury? It is said the Cubans have no treasury. The Haitians did have a treasury, full, overflowing—the memory of their wrongs. That was their treasury—grievous, blasting, blighting, insufferable wrongs. That steeled their arms. That supplied the place of munitions, of lead, of powder, of guns. All these things were put into the commissary and quartermaster's department of the revolutionists because they had the one thing needful, the inextinguishable love of freedom and of country; the inextinguishable hatred of the foreign race and the foreign rule. Therefore it was that they drove the French colony, the French army, literally into the sea; and all the people on the dry land and on the hills and in the valleys clapped their hands in glee to see the waters overwhelm their oppressors. It was a terrible victory, one of indescribable barbarity and atrocity, but when you corner a whole people, corner them on the question of liberty or death, they will deal death and destruction in return.

They were armed in that same spirit spoken of by the Earl of Chatham when, more than a century ago, he addressed the cortes of Great Britain upon the subject of war with the colonies and said: "My lords, you can not conquer America. You may raise armies; you may make campaigns; you may even win battles; but you will never subdue the spirit of liberty in that people." It is the spirit. What flesh or blood can strive with it? It is the spirit of liberty. Neither flesh, nor blood, nor the power of Spain, nor the gates of hell can prevail against it.

We not only have to consider in the present instance the Cuban campaign, but the long duration of it, the extremities to which those resisting the Spanish Crown have been driven by the necessities of the situation. We must also consider that there can be but one result. It may be delayed; it may be deferred; it can not be defeated. It will be the ultimate independence of the people of the island.

Mr. President, I noted very closely the other day when the honorable and learned junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]—who I am sorry to say is just now absent from his seat, he was here at the commencement of the discussion—came into the Senate with the privileged question in one hand and a scrap of a newspaper in the other. When he exhibited his wound from the Spanish minister, "not as wide as a barn door nor as deep as a well," when he put his morsel of Spanish into the RECORD, when he had begun, continued, and concluded his personal explanation, I thought this was a very serious business; but as it concerned merely the difference about the meaning of one word, there might be a peaceable adjustment.

However, when the junior Senator from Massachusetts returned afterwards on the self-same day to explain his explanation and to exploit and to explore his explanation, I began to see a very considerable diminution in the size and bulk of the Cuban question. I began to conceive that, after all, it had settled down to single combat, a duello within the four quarters of the code, between the Spanish minister on the one hand and the distinguished junior Senator on the other. I was about to propose a choice of weapons, for I supposed nothing remained to do except to select the seconds and make a choice of weapons. But a friend near me said, "Your suggestion is premature; there will be no fight, there will be no duel." I was very anxious on the part of one of the combatants at least to suggest a choice of weapons. I felt the deepest solicitude that our champion of Senatorial privilege should, when he rode into the list, not go there without being fully armed, with visor closed and lance at rest. I was anxious he should not be mistaken for a mere neophyte, a sciolist, a mere harlequin with a sword of leather and a dagger of lath. But my friend said, "You are too fast; there will be no fight." All the trouble comes from the inordinate fondness which the junior Senator from Massachusetts has for a certain kind of confectionery or pastry, puffs. Cream? Vanilla? Tutti-frutti? No. Plain puffs; press puffs. When the junior Senator from Massachusetts has filled his basket with these puffs and retired to the committee room upon Foreign Relations and regaled himself to satiety that will be the last of it, for what is HeCuba to him, or he to Hecuba?

Then the junior Senator from Massachusetts, the coadjutor of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations thus far, quoted in sepulchral tones the provision of the Constitution of the United States that no member of either House for any speech or debate occurring here should be questioned in any other place, and he insisted there had been a breach of the privileges of the Senate.

Mr. President, I thought everyone knew that this provision of the Constitution related to actual litigation, and when a member or Senator published or uttered a slander or libel here upon any citizen of the United States the member or Senator so summoned at the law might plead this provision and take no further trouble about his utterance or his address. That is the only purpose of the provision. No one ever dreamed that this provision, in the colloquial sense of the word, prevented what is said here from being questioned elsewhere. No one ever supposed that any man anywhere in the world could not question what was uttered in the Senate of the United States; question its truth, question its authority, question the sincerity of the author, or make a counter statement. That would be to embarrass freedom of speech—utterly to deny it.

There was no breach of privilege here of the Senate. The Spanish minister defined exactly what his indiscretion was. It was a violation of the conventionalities of his position. There was a breach of courtesy inasmuch as he took public notice and made a criticism upon debate here in the Senate as there would have been a breach if he had given a criticism upon debate anywhere in the United States. Owing to the ordinary courtesy of the diplomatic corps, a corps distinguished for its courtesy, there has always been an express reticence and silence implied and enforced that there should be no allusion by any member of the corps to any debate or discussion of American parties, either here or elsewhere.

The Spanish minister was guilty of another indiscretion. It was an error of appraisement. It is what is called in the custom-house undervaluation. The Spanish minister had forgotten that the learned and honorable junior Senator from Massachusetts had been a Senator in the service for twenty-five or thirty years; that he had been a lifelong member of the Committee on Foreign Relations; that he was an international jurist of world-wide reputation; that he was a postgraduate of the jingo high school of omniscience. The Spanish minister had forgotten; but the minister had not long resided in the country. Certainly this offense was pardonable. And allow me to say, Mr. President, there are a great many people living in the United States who do not know these things about the junior Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that the regular order may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senator from Indiana may proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. TURPIE. I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to another indiscretion of the Spanish minister. He had forgotten to read the lines of the celebrated epic poet of his own country, the great poet of Andalusia, written upon a theme that chanced one day. I have it here in the original Spanish, and as it has become fashionable to put Spanish into the RECORD I take the occasion to read it in these words:

Pigmies—

The first word is English [laughter]—

Pigmies, though puffed and perched on Alps,
Are pigmies still.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer. I might go into the quest of what is to be the future destiny of Cuba. I believe, sir, and have every reason to think the coming event is near. All shadows are cast before it. It is that independence will be the fortune of the island. It may become the site of a very large colored population, just as has occurred in the case of San Domingo. Indeed, sir, the West Indian Archipelago may become the field of colonization of that people which our forefathers dreamed of, all having an autonomous legislation, an autonomous government, with very close national or international relations with the great Republic of the United States.

But our duty, sir, lies here in the present. Belligerency, mediation, unanimity, dispatch—these are the principal things necessary both in the present and future consideration of this question. I trust, and I have confidence, that the best abilities of the National Legislature in both Houses from time to time, as events demand and as necessities occur, will give to the subject that consideration which patriotism, a love of liberty, the progress of free institutions shall require.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the joint resolution may continue to lie on the table for further discussion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, without objection.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is necessary to have a brief executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill. I simply wish to have the bill laid before the Senate, and then I shall yield to other Senators for a short time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6249) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I now yield to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD].

JAMES W. DUNN.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 321) granting a pension to James W. Dunn.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "roll," to strike out "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws"; and after the word "Volunteers," in line 7, to insert "at the rate of $60 per month"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of James W. Dunn, late private Company E, Ninety-third Pennsylvania Volunteers, at the rate of $60 per month.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report in that case be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. HAWLEY February 25, 1896, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 321) granting a pension to James W. Dunn, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report thereon:

He is at present receiving $12 per month for total disability under the act of June 27, 1890.

His application for increase to $72 per month for total disability caused by paralysis of the left side as the result of gunshot wound of left groin, necessitating the constant attendance of one or more persons, was rejected by the Pension Office, December 1, 1890. The reason given was that "paralysis of the right (left) side can not be accepted as a result of the wound of groin."

The evidence on file in the Pension Office is conclusive that Dunn is and has been for many years totally disabled, and the only question is as to whether the paralysis of the left side, causing such disability, is properly traceable to the gunshot wound of the left groin. On this point the reports of the various medical boards which examined Dunn differ, but the affidavits of numerous physicians who have attended him agree that his present condition is resultant from his wound.

Dr. Jesse H. Peek, of Hampton, Va., after examining Dunn on December 7, 1889, made affidavit as follows:

"This man has paralysis of left side, is totally unable to walk or even move hand or foot of that side. Claims to have received a gunshot wound in left groin about 1 inch external to femoral artery, and that it was a running sore for many years. Finally the ball came out and the wound healed. Since then has had three attacks of paralysis, the last the worst one, leaving him in his present totally disabled condition.

"It is necessary that he have an attendant. If the long-continued suppuration in the region of the anterior crural nerve produced such structural changes in the nerve as to produce paralysis of the muscles of the thigh, the disease could have extended into the spinal column, producing hemiplegia from spinal origin."

Dr. R. Armstrong, of Lockhaven, Pa., made affidavit July 21, 1887, as follows:

"I have been a practicing physician for thirty-three years; have practiced medicine in this place for thirty-one years. I was the family physician of the family of James W. Dunn and knew him from boyhood; never had occasion to prescribe for him prior to his enlistment in the Army of the rebellion and always considered him a healthy young man. I treated him on his return from the Army for complications superinduced by wounds and exposure, and had but little hope of his recovery."

Dr. O. McMullen, of Elizabeth City, N. C., made affidavit September 28, 1891, that:

"I have this day given James W. Dunn, of Company E, Ninety-third Pennsylvania, a thorough examination, and find him suffering from total paralysis of the left side, together with some degree of aphasia. He has, from his statement, suffered from three strokes of paralysis—one at 26 years old, one at 31 years old, and one at 39 years old—each stroke of increasing severity, the last leaving him in his present condition. The applicant claims to have received a bullet wound in the groin in 1862. In 1865 suppuration began and was more or less constant until 1877, when the bullet came away. Two of the strokes of paralysis occurred during the suppuration and one has transpired since its cessation.

"We are of opinion that the constant discharge, in all probability, produced such acheramalous changes in the cerebral blood vessels as led to their rupture, and consequently to the paralysis. We are led to this belief from the comparative early age at which the paralysis overtook the patient, and by the absence of any other reason. The applicant is totally disabled for all kinds of work—mental and physical—and requires a constant attendant. I further testify that I have been in the active practice of medicine for eleven years, and am a graduate from the University of Virginia."

Each of these affiants is certified by the officer administering the oath to be a reputable physician and citizen of good standing.

The official medical board at Erie, Pa., examined him September 1, 1886, and reported that he was suffering from gunshot wound of head and groin; also that the entire left side is paralyzed. They state they can find no connection between the wounds and the paralysis.

The medical board at Hampton, Va., reports the results of its examination on March 12, 1890, as follows:

"We hereby certify that in compliance with the requirements of the law we have carefully examined this applicant, who states that he is suffering from the following disability, incurred in the service, viz: Gunshot wound of left groin. Alleges paralysis of left side, due to retention of ball with suppuration for fifteen years. Gunshot wound of forehead alleged to have been incurred in service, and that he receives a pension of $4 per month.

"He makes the following statement upon which he bases his claim for increase: Received the wound of groin in 1862 and the ball suppurated out from point of entrance in 1877. Had a stroke of paralysis of left side in 1869. Recovered in about three weeks. Another stroke in 1874 and recovered partially, but did not get full use of left side. In 1882 a third stroke caused complete paralysis of left side from which he has never recovered. Received a gunshot wound of forehead at the same time he was shot in the groin.

"Upon examination we find the following objective conditions: Pulse rate, 100; respiration, 20; temperature, —; height, 5 feet 9 inches; weight, 140 pounds; age, 46 years. Claimant is brought to examination in a wheeled chair from which he can not rise without assistance, and he can not stand for a moment without being supported. Requires the aid of another person to remove his clothing.

"We find just below middle of Poupart's ligament on left side a cicatrix of gunshot wound, well healed, indurated, and adherent to soft parts. Some induration of parts immediately around cicatrix. There is no cicatrix of exit. The left arm and leg are completely paralyzed. He can not move a muscle in the arm. The flexor tendons are strongly contracted, the forearm is at a right angle with humerus, the fingers are drawn into the palm with such force that the terminal phalanx of little finger has been dislocated. It requires great force to draw any of the fingers away from the palm. Muscles of arm and forearm much atrophied. The left thigh and leg also completely paralyzed, and there is no power of motion in any part of thigh, leg, or foot. There is not the same contraction of the flexors as in the arm, but the toes have a tendency to draw downward. Sensation is not lost and he can distinguish two points touching arm or leg at 3 inches apart. He seems to have some difficulty in respiration, at intervals drawing a long breath with an effort. We think the pectoral muscles are somewhat affected on left side. He is, in our opinion, entitled to a first-grade rating for the disability caused by gunshot wound of left groin and paralysis of left side. He requires the constant aid and attention of another person.

"The paralysis seems to be due to lesion of spinal cord and upper dorsal or lower cervical region and not to lesion of the brain, as no cerebral disturbance appears and no paralysis of face or tongue. It is possible that the central nerve lesion was a result of the peripheral injury to the anterior crural nerves. No paralysis of face or neck. Pupils normal, tongue protrudes straight. Intelligence good. No difficulty in articulation. Heart's action regular; no murmurs. Good vesicular murmur throughout both lungs. Gunshot wound of forehead. We find over left side of frontal bone at edge of hair a linear scar of gunshot wound running longitudinally, about 1½ inches long, well-healed, adherent to fascia of scalp. No depression of bone. The paralysis exists from root of neck through the entire left side, and the difficult respiration shows lesion of nerves governing the muscular action of the pectoral muscles. That it is not due to the wound of head seems evident from the absence of facial or lingual paralysis. The gunshot wound of groin must have injured the anterior crural nerve near its commencement. There is no evidence to show how deep the burrowing of ball extended; there is simply an indurated cicatrix in the groin."

The medical board at Philadelphia, Pa., examined the claimant October 5, 1890. They report as to his "present condition" as follows:

"Find total paralysis of left side. Sensation diminished three-fourths. Is confined to his bed or chair. Unable to walk. Spatial sense otherwise normal. Paralysis result of apoplexy. Intellect clear. Paralysis from present indications permanent. Gunshot wound of head —. Find linear cicatrix 1 inch long, 3 inches above left eye. Scar nonadherent and not contracted. Find no depression. He is, in our opinion, entitled to eight-eighteenths rating for the disability caused by gunshot wounds, second grade for that caused by paralysis. Man unable to perform manual labor. Difficult to determine whether paralysis is the result of wounds."

It will be seen that of these three official reports but one claims that there is no connection between the wound and the paralysis, one is doubtful, and the other finds a direct connection.

It is established of record that the claimant was wounded at Fairoaks, Va., May 31, 1862, by gunshot wound of left groin; that the bullet remained in the wound for fifteen years, causing constant suppuration; that during this period the claimant had three strokes of paralysis, each succeeding one making his condition worse, until now he is an absolute wreck, his whole left side completely paralyzed, and that he is quite helpless and dependent upon the attendance of others. That this condition is directly traceable to the wound received in 1862 there can be no doubt, and although the Pension Office may have felt justified from a strictly legal standpoint, in view of the conflicting reports of its medical boards, in rejecting the claim, it is one in which Congress, acting as it does in the capacity of a court of equity, ought certainly to give relief.

Your committee therefore report back the bill with amendments, as follows:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" and insert at the end of the bill the words "at the rate of $60 per month."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUBPORT OF ENTRY AT SANTA BARBARA.

Mr. WHITE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2412) to make the city of Santa Barbara, county of Santa Barbara, State of California, a subport of entry.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will that bill lead to any discussion?

Mr. WHITE. I do not think it will lead to any discussion. I do not see how it can do so. It does not appropriate any money or create any office. I do not suppose there will be any objection to it. I ask that it be read, and if there is any objection after it has been read, of course I shall withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIEUT. GILMAN L. JOHNSON.

Mr. GEAR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1499) to correct the muster of Lieut. Gilman L. Johnson.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the bill be read for information. Unanimous consent can not be given without our knowing for what it is given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of War to correct the record of Second Lieut. Gilman L. Johnson, late of the One hundred and forty-second Regiment of New York Infantry, so as to make his muster as lieutenant date from the date of his enlistment and that he have all rights and emoluments due him thereby or by reason thereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

E. C. CHIROUSE.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 1828. It is an exceedingly meritorious measure, and I should like to have it passed.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1828) to authorize the Auditor for the Interior Department to settle and adjust the account of E. C. Chirouse, Indian agent at the Tulalip Agency, Wash.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "such," to strike out "award" and insert "allow"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Auditor for the Interior Department be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and adjust the accounts of E. C. Chirouse, Indian agent at Tulalip Agency, under bond of March 22, 1871, upon principles of equity and justice, and to allow such credits as appear to have been made in good faith and have inured to the benefit of the Indians and the United States, and to report his findings on said accounts to the Comptroller of the Treasury for his decision thereon: Provided, however, That before any adjustment is made under this act the defendants shall pay the costs already incurred in the pending suit on the bond above mentioned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from South Dakota in charge of the Indian appropriation bill, for the purpose of seeing if I can not arrange with him either to-day or to-morrow to get an hour for the consideration of the pension bills which are now on the Calendar.

In this connection, I will state to the Senate, and especially to the Senator from South Dakota, that during this entire session the Committee on Pensions have had but one single hour for the consideration of their bills. In the other House Friday evenings are devoted to this purpose. While the Calendar is not overloaded, yet there is a considerable number of pension bills upon it in which many Senators are interested. I think I am not personally interested in a single one of them, but I should like very much to get an hour, either to-day or to-morrow, for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. PETTIGREW. So far as I am personally concerned, I will agree that some time to-morrow afternoon, just before the adjournment——

Mr. GALLINGER. Say at 4 o'clock.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That at 4 o'clock to-morrow pension bills alone shall be taken up.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that that order may be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6249) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I now ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the Indian appropriation bill be dispensed with and that the committee amendments be first acted upon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose the Senator desires to have the bill read until the amendments are reached?

Mr. ALLISON. The idea is to dispense with the first formal reading.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly; to proceed with the bill in the usual way.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read regularly, and the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations acted upon as they are reached.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is precisely what I desire, that the bill be read and the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations be disposed of as we reach them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the committee was, on page 1, line 6, after the word "for," to insert "all offices the salaries for which are specifically provided for herein for"; and in line 8, after the word "year," to strike out "for the year"; so as to make the clause read:

That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department in full compensation for all offices the salaries for which are specifically provided for herein for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and fulfilling treaty stipulations for the various Indian tribes, namely.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 17, to increase the appropriation for the pay of Indian agent at the Pine Ridge Agency, S. Dak., from $1,800 to $2,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 4, to increase the pay of Indian agent at the Rosebud Agency, S. Dak., from $1,800 to $2,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 20, after the word "Agency," to insert "at Navajo Springs"; so as to make the clause read:

At the Southern Ute Agency at Navajo Springs, Colo., $1,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 23, to increase the pay of Indian agent at the Standing Rock Agency, N. Dak., from $1,800 to $2,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 18, to increase the total for the pay of Indian agents from $85,000 to $86,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 13, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred"; and in line 14, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifteen thousand" and insert "twelve thousand five hundred"; so as to make the clause read:

For pay of five Indian inspectors, at $2,500 per annum each, $12,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 19, after the words "Secretary of the Interior," to insert "for a period not to exceed twenty days"; so as to make the clause read:

For necessary traveling expenses of five Indian inspectors, including telegraphing and incidental expenses of inspection and investigation, including also expenses of going to and going from the seat of Government, and while remaining there under orders and direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for a period not to exceed twenty days, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 8, after the word "agencies," to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-five"; so as to make the clause read:

For buildings and repairs of buildings at agencies, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 15, to strike out:

Cherokees: For the payment of the second installment due on the 4th day of March, 1896, to the Cherokee Nation, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1893, for the purchase of the Cherokee Outlet, the sum of $1,660,000, to be available immediately after March 3, 1896.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 13, to increase the appropriation for subsistence, civilization, etc., of the Northern Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians from $101,000 to $111,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 20, to insert:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to transfer on the books of the Treasury Department, from the fund of $55,058.21 now held for the Sac and Fox tribe of Indians of the Mississippi, the sum of $42,893.25 to the credit of that portion of said tribe of Indians now residing in the State of Iowa; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the attorneys employed by said Sac and Fox Indians residing in the State of Iowa, under contract approved by him for legal services rendered said Indians in the prosecution of their claim to said fund, from said sum hereby authorized and directed to be transferred, as soon as said transfer shall be made, the sum of $4,289.32, or so much thereof as shall be necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. This seems to be only a part of the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true. The Chair thought that, being a paragraph, it might as well be disposed of.

Mr. PLATT. The two paragraphs are separate and refer to different subjects.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not know what the object of the amendment is, and I think perhaps some explanation ought to be made by the Senator who has charge of the bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In the Indian appropriation act of last year a clause was inserted instructing the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and adjust the differences which existed between the different bands of this tribe of Indians. A portion of those Indians resided in Kansas and a portion of them in Iowa. The Iowa Indians claimed that they were entitled to their share of the annuities and property of the tribe in proportion to their number.

The Secretary of the Interior, after examining the whole matter, recommended that they were entitled to their share of the proceeds of the lands sold in Kansas when they removed to the Indian Territory, and he decided that they were not entitled to any of the other items. He recommended that this transfer be made in order to pay the Sac and Fox Indians of Iowa for their share of the land which was disposed of in Kansas.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The pending amendment is to carry out the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The amendment is to carry out the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the act of Congress of last year.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Arkansas will remember, I think, that the Iowa Sac and Fox Indians made a claim for three or four hundred thousand dollars, and we authorized them to go to the Secretary of the Interior and have a hearing on all those claims. This is the result of the hearing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the pleasure of the Senate that the amendment shall be considered as an entirety or shall a vote be taken upon the paragraph which has been read?

Mr. PETTIGREW. We had better dispose of this paragraph first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 27, after the amendment just adopted, to insert:

That the United States hereby accepts and assumes jurisdiction over the Sac and Fox Indians of Tama County, in the State of Iowa, and of their lands in said State, as tendered to the United States by the act of the legislature of said State passed on the 16th day of January, 1896, subject to the limitations therein contained; and the United States Indian agent of the Sac and Fox Agency, Iowa, and the governor of the State of Iowa, respectively, are hereby authorized to transfer by deed of conveyance, for the use and benefit of said Indians, the legal title held by them in trust, respectively, and the trusteeship of the lands of the Sac and Fox Indians of Tama County, Iowa, to the Secretary of the Interior and his successors in office.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest that the Senator in charge of the bill had better make some explanation of this amendment as well.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Those Indians own about 3,000 acres of land in Iowa. They purchased the land of settlers or people living in that country. It was not, therefore, an Indian reservation. The courts of the State had jurisdiction, and there was a conflict of jurisdiction. The legislature of Iowa passed an act ceding jurisdiction to the United States in order to stop the conflict of authority, and this is to accept that jurisdiction.

Mr. GEAR. One word in regard to this matter, in reply to the question asked by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. The Sac and Fox Indians bought this land by permission of the Government in 1842. They ceded all their lands in Iowa and were transferred to territory west of the Missouri River. A portion seceded from the main band of Sacs and Foxes. The Government gave them its permission to buy this land, but for fear they might trade the land off or dissipate it in some way or other, title was placed in the governor of Iowa. The legislature of Iowa, as stated by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], authorized the cession of the jurisdiction over the land to the Federal Government, and all that the amendment does is to place those Indians where they properly belong, as wards of the nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the provision for the Seminoles, on page 28, line 19, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Provided, That the sums of money mentioned in this and the preceding paragraph shall be paid to said Indians by an officer designated by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest that the Senator in charge of the bill give some explanation to the Senate as to why this amendment is proposed. I understand the same provision is in another part of the bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The representatives of those Indians objected to having this particular fund distributed per capita, for the reason that they are using this money for school purposes, and they would be obliged to close their schools. There are other funds which belong to those Indians which have to be distributed per capita, and in another place in the bill we provide that all funds which are to be distributed per capita shall be distributed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest, then, that the amendment be passed over informally, as there are some Senators who wish to investigate the matter to some extent.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to its being passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over for the present.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the items for the Sioux of different tribes, including Santee Sioux of Nebraska, on page 32, line 25, before the word "persons," to strike out "10,000"; so as to read:

For twenty-seventh of thirty installments, to purchase such articles as may be considered proper by the Secretary of the Interior, at $20 per head, for persons engaged in agriculture, $160,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 2, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary, in his discretion, is authorized to pay said amount per head in money.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire the attention of the Senator having the bill in charge. I should like to offer an amendment after line 3, on page 33, in the following language——

Mr. PETTIGREW. We are proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement to dispose of the committee amendments. After they are disposed of the Senator will be in order.

Mr. ALLEN. I was going to suggest to the Senator that it is a mere formal amendment, and I thought upon this statement he would accept it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think we will adhere to the rule and let the Senator offer his amendment after we dispose of the committee amendments.

Mr. ALLEN. Then, as we seem to be standing upon technicalities here as usual, and caviling upon punctuation points and matters of such importance, I want to give notice of the introduction of this amendment, which is an amendment to the amendment, and I reserve the amendment itself as well as the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the committee amendment be reserved with no action taken upon it, and let notice be given of the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered. It is not necessary to read the amendment to the amendment now unless the Senator from Nebraska desires to have it read.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 3 add the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause an actual delivery of the flannel clothing herein, and contemplated in prior acts of Congress and treaties, to the Santee Sioux and Ponca Indians of Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will let me make a statement of two minutes' length and that he will then accept this amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. After we have disposed of the committee amendments I am willing that this shall be inserted.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well. I will make my statement in a second whether the Senate consents or not.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I can not stop the Senator from talking.

Mr. ALLEN. No; but you can consent to my amendment after I explain it; and I think the Senator will do so.

Under the law and the treaties with these Indians the Government is required to furnish females over a certain age—over 12 years of age, I think—and certain other classes of the Indians with flannel clothing. I am reliably informed that the Government has never furnished a particle of flannel for these Indians, that their goods are cotton goods, that flannels never have been furnished them. Therefore I simply ask the Senator having the bill in charge to let this amendment go in directing the Secretary of the Interior to carry into execution the evident purpose of this and prior laws on the subject. The climate in Nebraska where these Indians reside is of such a degree of severity that the Senator will recognize the propriety of requiring the persons who make the contracts with the Government for the delivery of these articles to live up in good faith to the requirements of the statutes and the treaties. That is all I want to accomplish. I do not see why the Senator can not consent to the amendment now as well as at any other time.

Mr. PLATT. Let me understand. This is a proposition to amend the committee amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is an entirely new matter.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from Connecticut will bear with me, I will state that it is in the nature of an amendment to the committee amendment, simply making it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to require the purchase and delivery to these Indians of the woolen clothing called for in the proposed act and called for in previous acts and treaties with these Indians. Woolen clothing has never been delivered to them, I am told.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will accept the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well. I am very thankful.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment is accepted. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 34, line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "seventy-five"; and in line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-eight" and insert "ninety-eight"; so as to read:

For support and maintenance of day and industrial schools, including purchase, erection, and repairs of school buildings, in accordance with article 7 of the treaty of April 29, 1868, which article is continued in force for twenty years by section 17 of the act of March 2, 1889, $75,000; in all, $1,398,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 12, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of section 17 of the act entitled "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889, shall be construed to extend and apply to each head of a family or single person over the age of 18 years of the Flandreau Band of Sioux Indians and of the Santee Sioux in Nebraska who was entitled under section 7 of said act to take an allotment or not, at his or her option, and who accepted $1 per acre in lieu of such allotment, and each head of a family or single person over the age of 18 years shall be entitled to all the rights and benefits of said section 17 except that of taking an allotment, in the same manner as though he or she had taken an allotment thereunder.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, after line 3, to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain the number of Santee Sioux Indians of Nebraska who would not be benefited by the fulfillment of the proviso of section 17 of an act entitled "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Great Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations and secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889, by the receipt from the United States of the articles of personal property therein mentioned and who desire to have the same converted into money, and in lieu of such articles of personal property, or any part thereof he may think proper, the Secretary of the Interior shall convert or commute the same, or so much thereof as he may think proper, into money, and pay the amount thereof to such Indians; and the payment under the provisions of this act shall be held to be a liquidation of the obligation of the United States to said Indians under that portion of said section 17, so far as the articles of personal property therein named are concerned.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move, in line 5, to strike out the word "Santee" before the word "Sioux"; at the beginning of line 6 to strike out the word "of" before "Nebraska"; and to add after line 5 the words "South Dakota and"; so that the provision will embrace not simply the Santees in Nebraska, but all the Sioux Indians. That was the intention when the amendment was drawn, I think.

Mr. ALLEN. That is right, with one addition. I want it to embrace also the Ponca Indians of Nebraska.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to that. I will move to add "and the Ponca Indians of Nebraska" after the word "Nebraska."

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; let it embrace the Poncas and Santees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. ALLEN. How will it read now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the clause as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain the number of Sioux Indians of South Dakota and Nebraska and Ponca Indians of Nebraska who would not be benefited by the fulfillment of the proviso, etc.

Mr. ALLEN. Let me ask the Senator from South Dakota if that would not embrace other Indians than the Santee Sioux in the two States?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It would embrace all the Sioux Indians.

Mr. ALLEN. All the Sioux Indians in both States?

Mr. PETTIGREW. In both States.

Mr. ALLEN. All who are entitled to rights and privileges under the act of 1889?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. That is satisfactory.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 36, line 21, under the head of "Spokanes," to strike out "thrashing" before "machines," and insert "threshing."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 14, to insert:

SOUTHERN UTES IN COLORADO.

To carry out the provisions of the act of February 20, 1895, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause rations and supplies to be issued each month at Ignacio, La Plata County, Colo., and at Arboles, Archuleta County, Colo., to all Southern Ute Indians to whom lands have been allotted and who are residing on their allotments. And the Secretary of the Interior shall establish an agency on the Southern Ute Indian Reservation, at Navajo Springs, in the county of Montezuma, Colo., and shall cause rations and supplies to be issued each month or oftener at that point to all Southern Ute Indians who have not elected to take land in severalty under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to disapprove the treaty heretofore made with the Southern Ute Indians to be removed to the Territory of Utah, and providing for settling them in severalty when they may so elect and are qualified, and to settle all those not electing to take lands in severalty on the west 40 miles of the present reservation and in portions of New Mexico, and for other purposes, and to carry out the provisions of the treaty with said Indians June 15, 1880," approved February 20, 1895.

For the erection of suitable agency buildings on said reservation at Navajo Springs, Montezuma County, Colo., for the use of such Southern Ute Indians as have not elected to take allotments of land in severalty, $10,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to have the Senator in charge of the bill make some statement about the purposes of the amendment. I did not hear it read distinctly. I do not understand it exactly.

Mr. TELLER. I will state to the Senator from Arkansas that it is to carry out the provisions of the act of 1895 that we passed allowing such of them as chose to take lands in severalty and the rest to go on the west end of the reservation, and it was agreed in that act to maintain the reservation on the west end. This is to carry out that provision.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the items for the Winnebagoes, on page 40, after line 12, to insert:

That any sums of money appropriated in this act that are to be paid per capita to individual Indians shall be paid to said Indians by an officer of the Government designated by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that the amendment, it seems to me, ought to be amended. It is limited now to sums of money to be paid under the bill, and it seems to me it would be wise to provide that sums of money hereafter paid to individual Indians shall be paid by an officer of the Government, so that it shall not be limited to this bill, but may become a general law.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think such an amendment to the amendment is very proper, and I am willing to accept it.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas to strike out the words "in this act"; so as to read: "That any sums of money appropriated that are to be paid per capita," etc. Or strike out the word "appropriated," and read: "That any sums of money that are to be paid," etc.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. "That are hereafter to be paid." I will put in the word "hereafter," so as to show it is not limited to this bill, but would apply to any future act.

Mr. TELLER. All right.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I accept the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move to strike out in line 13 the words "appropriated in this act that," and in line 14 to strike out the word "are" and insert "hereafter"; so as to read:

That any sums of money hereafter to be paid per capita to individual Indians shall be paid to said Indians by an officer of the Government designated by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Perhaps the Senator is ready now to go back and agree to the amendment on page 28, which we passed over.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There is a Senator absent who takes some interest in that amendment, who will not be here until to-morrow, and I should prefer that the amendment be passed over until he returns.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 42, line 15, to increase the appropriation "for support, civilization, and instruction of the Shoshones and Bannocks, and other Indians of the Fort Hall Reservation, in Idaho," from "$20,000" to "$30,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, after line 16, to strike out:

For pay of physician at the New York Agency, $600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 21, after the word "amount," to insert "after paying employees authorized by law"; and in line 23, after the words "Oklahoma Territory," to insert "South Dakota"; so as to make the clause read:

For support and civilization of the Ponca Indians, including pay of employees, $15,000: Provided, That this amount, after paying employees authorized by law, shall be divided per capita among all the members of said tribe in Oklahoma Territory, South Dakota, and in the State of Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, after line 24, to insert:

For purchase of seed and grain and for subsistence for the Ponca Indians in Nebraska and South Dakota, $5,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 3, to increase the appropriation "For support and civilization of the Walla Walla, Cayuse, and Umatilla tribes, Oregon," from "$5,000" to "$6,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 5, to increase the appropriation "For support and civilization of the Yakimas and other Indians," from "$8,000" to "$10,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 21, to strike out "David M. Jerome" and insert "David H. Jerome"; so as to make the clause read:

To pay balance due the commission appointed under act approved March 2, 1889, for per diem and expenses, as follows: Alfred M. Wilson, $1,245; Warren G. Sayre, $1,245: David H. Jerome, $1,245, commissioners; and Charles S. King, secretary, $702; in all, $4,437.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, after line 5, to insert:

For setting up and operating two portable steam sawmills on the Nez Perce Indian Reservation, Idaho, including transportation of mill machinery from the agency to the mill site, $3,130.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 25, after the word "leased," to insert "in the discretion of the Secretary"; and on page 49, line 2, after the word "by," to strike out "the Secretary" and insert "him"; so as to make the clause read:

To enable the President to cause, under the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians," such Indian reservations as in his judgment are advantageous for agricultural and grazing purposes to be surveyed, or resurveyed, for the purposes of said act, and to complete the allotment of the same, including the necessary clerical work incident thereto in the field and in the office of Indian Affairs, and delivery of trust patents, so far as allotments shall have been selected under said act, $30,000: Provided, That whenever it shall be made to appear to the Secretary of the Interior that by reason of age, disability, or inability any allottee of Indian lands under this or former acts of Congress can not personally and with benefit to himself occupy or improve his allotment or any part thereof the same may be leased in the discretion of the Secretary upon such terms, regulations, and conditions as shall be prescribed by him, for a term not exceeding five years for farming or grazing purposes, or ten years for mining or business purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, after line 15, to strike out:

To pay the expense of the preparation of a digest, under the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, of the decisions of the courts and the Interior Department, and the opinions of the Attorney-General relating to Indian Affairs, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 21, after the word "irrigating," to strike out "machinery" and insert "tools"; and in line 24, after the word "dollars," to insert "and of this amount not exceeding $2,700 may be used for the temporary employment of persons of practical experience in irrigation work at a compensation not to exceed $75 per month each"; so as to make the clause read:

For the construction, purchase, and use of irrigating tools and appliances on Indian reservations, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and subject to his control, $30,000, and of this amount not exceeding $2,700 may be used for the temporary employment of persons of practical experience in irrigation work at a compensation not to exceed $75 per month each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, at the beginning of line 15, to strike out "to enable the Secretary of the Interior" and insert "That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint a commission to consist of three persons, not more than two of whom shall be of the same political party, and not more than one of whom shall be resident of any one State."

Mr. HOAR. In lines 17 and 18, on page 50, I move to strike out from the committee amendment the words "not more than two of whom shall be of the same political party." I think it is a most vicious principle of legislation for political parties to have the offices distributed between them. Suppose the best men in the country happen to be Populists, why should not they be appointed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lines 17 and 18, on page 50, in the amendment of the committee, it is proposed to strike out "not more than two of whom shall be of the same political party."

Mr. PETTIGREW. This is a custom which has been established for some time, and it seems to me there is no good reason why it should be now changed. I think the Senator from Massachusetts ought to withdraw his amendment, or at least not propose it until his political party gets into power. This is a precedent, I think, established under the Administration of Harrison, and our Democratic friends being now in control of the Administration, I am disposed to let the custom continue, at least during this Administration. I hope the Senator will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. It has nothing to do with my party. The very observation of my honorable friend from South Dakota seems to me to warrant the amendment, he suggesting because my party happens to be in the minority at present, or not in the possession of executive power. I should not now offer the amendment.

I think the whole system of recognizing the distribution of public offices between different political parties is vicious legislation, and I believe the Senate has come to that conclusion. I remember the question has been raised two or three times. Such a provision got into bills a few years ago, but every time the question has been raised that provision has been stricken out, according to my recollection. I think we may trust in the President of the United States, at any rate a majority of the people think they can trust in the President of the United States whom they elect, to deal with this thing properly and consistently. This practice tends to increase rather than to diminish the parceling out of offices as political spoils, and as the property of political parties to be distributed, saying, "We shall have our share and you shall have your share."

At any rate, I hope the Senator will permit the amendment to be adopted, because I believe his committee have several times in the last few years themselves concluded that such provisions had better be stricken out.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, it seems to me the observation of the Senator from Massachusetts is not exactly just. I hope the provision of the amendment may be retained. There are many precedents for it. I am afraid that there might be some who would imagine that the Senator from Massachusetts seemed to think it entirely possible that all the best men belong to one party; and I want to break up any possibility of such an imagination.

Mr. HOAR. I will not say that, if my honorable friend will pardon me. I think a great many of the best men belong to the Democratic party, but I do not think that all of them do; perhaps not a majority; but there are certain classes of public officers, for instance, those acting as election officers, to whom the old system is applied; and whenever tellers are appointed in a legislative body their politics may be properly inquired into. Where, however, we are appointing officers for a particular duty, as in this case—and I desire to call the attention of my honorable friend from Virginia to it—where we are providing for a commission to negotiate with a band of Indians in the State of Washington, that system should not apply. It may be that there are two gentlemen whom the President or the Secretary of the Interior may discover who have an extraordinary knowledge of these Indians, who may have by residence among the Indians secured respect for their probity and character, who have dealt with them, perhaps having dwelt with the tribe, who should be appointed. There have been such instances in our history; but to put into an appropriation bill that no two of the members of a commission appointed to deal with an obscure tribe of Indians shall be of the same political party seems to me to be an extreme case of carrying the vicious principle to its most vicious extent.

Even if there are cases other than the cases of election officers to which that principle should be applied there are very few instances where, I suppose, both sides of the Chamber have not come to the conclusion that, as a general principle of legislation, it is all wrong.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DANIEL. I have already objected, sir. I do not care to debate it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the Senator. The Chair will then put the question on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. I will say that it has been the almost universal practice in establishing public commissions to provide against their being monopolized by one party. It seems to me that the provision contained in the bill is just and liberal.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says that two gentlemen might be so situated that they have some peculiar aptness for the position. That is true; and those two might be selected under this bill. What the amendment of the committee provides is that all three shall not be taken from the same political party; that only two shall be appointed from one political party. Certainly talents and attainments and fitness for the offices of public life are not so rare among the American people that we probably could not find three good men in any party competent to perform such duties. The object of the amendment is simply to make a fair, liberal, and representative commission. We respect this principle in the District of Columbia; we respect it even in the Civil Service Commission, and italicize our antagonism to partisanry in that Commission by selecting its members on account of their party relations.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the Senator from Virginia should happen to be proposed for such an office, who is going to determine whether he belongs to a political party or not?

Mr. DANIEL. I could determine that for myself.

Mr. HOAR. I know, but that is not the principle of determination. The President has to determine it. There are a good many persons who call themselves Republicans as to whom it would be difficult to find that they entertain or hold or avow a single Republican principle, and there are many persons who call themselves Democrats of whom zealous Democrats would say they had not a single Democratic principle. I have heard eminent and zealous Democrats say that the present Chief Executive of the United States was not a Democrat and that they did not know of any Democratic doctrine he held. In order to find that a man does not belong to one political party, you have ordinarily to ascertain that he does belong to another—not always, but usually—and the Chief Executive of the United States would be bound to inquire into political opinion. If a man does not choose to avow his political opinions at all, is he to be disqualified from office by law if he is the fittest person for the office? An eminent chief justice of New Hampshire did not vote for some forty years, or during the whole time he held a judicial office.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It seems to me that this bill as it comes from the committee and in this respect is entirely proper. Where we purchase an Indian reservation where the Indians have taken allotments in severalty and become citizens of the United States, in making negotiations with them it seems to me that both political parties should be properly represented. The Indians belong to both political parties, and there are chances in making the negotiations to favor one party over another among the Indians, to grant privileges for the purpose of influencing them to vote the ticket of a particular political party. There is as much reason why these commissioners should be of both political parties as there is that the judges at an election should be of both political parties. The provision is founded on reason, and is placed in the bill for a good purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. HOAR. I call for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again put the question.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I suggest that we let the amendment go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; I will consent to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 50, after the word "desirable," at the end of line 22, to strike out "by said Secretary of the Interior"; so as to read:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Yakima Indians in the State of Washington for the surrender of a portion of their reservation lands, and for such modification of existing treaties as may be deemed desirable, any agreement thus negotiated being subject to subsequent ratification by Congress, $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 51, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Uncompahgre tribe of Indians, and with the Indians residing upon the Uintah Reservation in the State of Utah, and with the Indians residing upon the Fort Hall Reservation in the State of Idaho, and, in his discretion, with any other Indians, for the surrender of any portions of their respective reservations, or for such modification of existing treaties and agreements as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, $15,000, and all agreements made for the purchase of the unallotted lands in any Indian reservation shall provide a fund for the payment of taxes upon inalienable allotments, but no agreement made shall take effect until ratified by Congress.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask my honorable friend from South Dakota if the negotiation with the Yakima Indians must necessarily be made by people of different political parties because there are political parties among the Indians, and one political party will get the advantage of the other unless you have two commissioners at least of different political parties, why at the same time this negotiation with the Uncompahgre tribe of Indians and with the Indians residing upon the Uintah Reservation, the Fort Hall and other reservations, should be conducted by one man who is a very zealous member of one political party? Why do you not have some Republican associated with the Secretary of the Interior in making this great number of negotiations?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will accept an amendment by the Senator to that effect.

Mr. HOAR. Then, in order that we may have the principle carried out, I move to insert after "Secretary of the Interior," in line 1, on page 51, in the amendment of the committee, the words, "associating with himself some other person of a different political faith from his own."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will accept the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that he incorporate in the amendment proposed by the committee the words of the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the amendment just read, on page 51, the following:

And a majority of the members of any board or commission to be paid from this appropriation shall be appointed from bona fide residents of the State or Territory in which is located the particular reservation concerning which such board or commission is appointed to negotiate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. I object to that amendment. It is the old question which has been discussed here time and time again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask my honorable friend from South Dakota why, in this matter, they did not carry out the sublime principle about different political parties?

Mr. LODGE. This is to be added to the amendment reported by the committee, as I understand it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. It is not the creation of a new board.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator says there is no such provision in the amendment. However, I will not raise the question.

Mr. CANNON. I did not understand the nature of the objection offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] to the proposed amendment, not being able to hear him.

Mr. CHILTON. In order to simplify the matter I raise the point that it is new legislation, general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the point is not well taken.

Mr. CHILTON. Then I simply object to the amendment to the amendment upon its merits. I do not think it is a good principle to go into the bill. I ask for a vote upon it. I have no desire to discuss the matter, because it has been talked about here time and time again. The question is stale, so to speak, and it will do no good now to discuss it over again. I am perfectly willing to submit it to the Senate on its merits.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the amendment may again be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following at the end of line 13, page 51:

And a majority of the members of any board or commission to be paid from this appropriation shall be appointed from bona fide residents of the State or Territory in which is located the particular reservation concerning which such board or commission is appointed to negotiate.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that it makes any difference how often a question has been discussed or how many times it has been temporarily settled. No question is settled until it is settled right. I do not see how any advocate of home rule can object to an amendment of this character, which proposes that in a matter of vital interest concerning any State or Territory a majority of the board to make negotiations shall be residents of that State or Territory. Those people know best the conditions surrounding a reservation; they can perform the service more efficiently, and certainly, as has been demonstrated, with greater economy to the Government than if a board shall be imported to negotiate with the Indians on the several reservations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. CHILTON. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. PETTIGREW. With the consent of the Senator from Texas, we will let the paragraph go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CHILTON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] to be that the amendment reported by the committee shall be passed over.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The amendment reported by the committee and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 51, after line 13, to strike out:

For surveying the Indian reservations in South Dakota, $20,000, to be immediately available.

And to insert:

To enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to extend the public-land surveys over the Cheyenne and Rosebud Indian reservations in the State of South Dakota, including examinations in the field and the necessary clerical work, $35,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move to insert what I send to the desk in place of what is proposed to be substituted by the committee. It is practically the same provision, with an increase of $1,000 for office and clerical work, which the officer says is necessary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert in lieu of the matter reported by the committee:

For the survey of lands in the Cheyenne River and Rosebud Indian reservations, in South Dakota, the sum of $30,000, to be immediately available; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby directed to survey the lands embraced in said reservations. For examination in the field of the survey of lands within the Cheyenne River and Rosebud Indian reservations, in South Dakota, under the direction of the Surveyor-General, including clerical work in the office of the Surveyor-General, the sum of $6,000.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest that the amendment to the amendment go over with the other amendments which have been passed over, and be printed, so that we can see just the form in which it is proposed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment and the amendment to the amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 9, on page 52.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move to increase the amount to $6,000, for the reason that that sum will construct two wells instead of one. Five thousand dollars is too much for one well and not enough for two, and two wells are necessary at that place.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, page 52, it is proposed to strike out the word "five" and insert "six"; so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to put down an artesian well or wells at or near Lake Andes, on the Yankton Indian Reservation, S. Dak., at such place or places as he may determine, for the purpose of supplying said Indians with water for domestic purposes, for stock, and for irrigation purposes, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls attention to the fact that the next six pages of the bill constitute amendments and asks the advice of the Senate as to how much of each shall be considered by itself, or whether it shall all be considered together.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Down to line 7, on page 54, concludes the first subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 9, page 52, the Committee on Appropriations report to insert:

Surveying lands in the Indian Territory: For the continuation of the survey of the lands in the Indian Territory, $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available: Provided, That the surveys herein authorized, or any part of them, in the Indian Territory shall be made under the supervision of the Director of the Geological Survey by such persons as may be employed by or under him for that purpose. And such surveys shall be executed under instructions to be issued by the Secretary of the Interior, and subdivisicnal surveys shall be executed under the rectangular system, as now provided by law: Provided further, That when any surveys shall have been so made and plats and field notes thereof prepared, they shall be approved and certified to by the Director of the Geological Survey, and two copies thereof shall be returned, one for filing in the Indian Office and one in the General Land Office; and such surveys, field notes, and plats shall have the same legal force and effect as heretofore given to the acts of surveyors-general: Provided further, That all laws inconsistent with the provisions hereof are hereby declared to be inoperative as respects such surveys: Provided further, That hereafter in the public-land surveys of the Indian Territory iron or stone posts shall be erected at each township corner, upon which shall be recorded the usual marks required to be placed on township corners by the laws and regulations governing public-land surveys; also, that similar monuments shall be established at the corners of the townships that have been already surveyed by the Geological Survey: And provided further, That the entire cost and transportation of such monuments to the Indian Territory shall not exceed $5,000, and the cost of the setting of the monuments in the areas already surveyed shall not exceed $2,500: Provided further, That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person to destroy, deface, change, or remove to another place any section corner, quarter-section corner, or meander post on any Government line of survey, or to cut down any witness tree or any tree blazed to mark the line of a Government survey, or to deface, change, or remove any monument or bench mark of any Government survey. That any person who shall offend against any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon sufficient proof thereof in any court shall be fined not exceeding $250 or be imprisoned not more than one hundred days. All the fines accruing under this act shall be paid into the Treasury, and the informer in each case of conviction shall be paid the sum of $25.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move to amend the amendment in line 12, page 52, by striking out the word "two" and inserting "three" before the word "hundred."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 12, page 52, it is proposed to strike out "two" and insert "three"; so as to read:

Surveying lands in the Indian Territory: For the continuation of the survey of the lands in the Indian Territory, $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not think I object particularly to the amendment to the amendment, although $200,000 is all that the Department estimated for this purpose. The committee therefore thought that it would be as much as could properly be expended this summer.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The statement of the Senator from South Dakota is strictly true; but it is also true that the Geological Survey made an estimate, which was submitted to the Interior Department, in which they made the statement that $300,000 could economically be used this year; that $300,000 would enable the Geological Survey to complete the survey of this country during the present year, and that it will take $300,000 to complete the survey.

If $200,000 is given this year the work can not be completed until next year. If anything is to be done in the way of changing the condition of things in the Indian Territory, it is absolutely necessary that the survey shall be completed at the earliest possible day. It will cost no more money to have the work done this year and completed within the present calendar year than it will to have it extend over two years. It is desirable in every way that it shall be done as promptly as possible. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be adopted and that the committee will not object.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think I shall have to take the sense of the Senate upon the amendment to the amendment, for the reason that the Committee on Appropriations refused by a vote, I think, to increase the amount.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose the same can be said of every Territory where there is land unsurveyed that is said by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] in reference to this matter; and if we begin to give all that can possibly be used we might as well settle upon that policy, and where there are surveys to be made proceed to give all that is wanted.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me, I will state that there exists nowhere a condition similar to the condition in the Indian Territory. Congress is now debating the propriety of making certain radical changes in the form of government in the Territory. The very first step preliminary to carrying out any plan that may be adopted by Congress must be the survey of that country. It was agreed to in the treaty of Fort Smith of 1867. The survey of the country is absolutely preliminary. Nothing can be carried out until it is done, and if a bill should be passed during the present Congress providing for changes in the Indian Territory, it can not possibly be put into operation or take effect until the completion of this survey. It will take twelve months now to finish it if $300,000 is given, which is necessary, and if it is cut in two it will simply take two years to do a work which otherwise could be done in one.

Mr. CULLOM. Is there an official estimate or statement that $300,000 can be used this year?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I know that the Director of the Geological Survey made that estimate and sent it to the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior did not officially estimate for the $300,000, but I know that the Director of the Geological Survey made such an estimate and recommended an appropriation of $300,000.

This measure went to the Committee on Indian Affairs. It was examined by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the amount of $300,000 was unanimously recommended and reported by the committee, and the matter went to the Committee on Appropriations. After careful examination by the Committee on Indian Affairs, there was no doubt among the members of the committee that the $300,000 proposed to be appropriated this year was absolutely necessary. Every member of the committee so believes and every member of the committee was in favor of such action being taken by the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. It would seem to me that if the Secretary of the Interior had thought that $300,000 was necessary for the present year, he would himself have recommended it; and does it not in a degree indicate that he does not believe that more than $200,000 can be used profitably during the present year when he failed so to recommend?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It may be possible that the Secretary of the Interior does believe that, but I venture very gently to suggest that there are people who are more familiar with the facts existing in that country than is the Secretary of the Interior, and whose judgment would be of more weight there than his.

The Secretary of the Interior can have no doubt that an appropriation of only $200,000 now means that they will be two years in making the survey. It is only a question as to whether or not there will be a delay in making the survey. Putting into the pending bill $200,000 simply means that Congress does not intend to take any steps further for two years or more in the Indian country, as all the proposed legislation will be held back and can not become effective until the completion of the survey.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I understand that while the Committee on Appropriations did not approve of $300,000, that sum was recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs. Am I correct?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from New Hampshire is correct in that statement.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then, when the member of the Committee on Appropriations who is in charge of the bill objects to the increase, he is objecting not as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, but as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. Am I right in my supposition, I ask the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall allow the Senator from New Hampshire to make his own speech.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to know in behalf of which opinion of the Senator from South Dakota I am to speak. I understand that the Committee on Indian Affairs, which knows all the circumstances connected with the opening of the Territory and knows the wants of the Territory, after a full investigation of the subject, came to the conclusion that there was special reason for expedition in the survey of those lands and therefore recommended $300,000, and that it is the judgment of the Senator from South Dakota that such an amount of money ought to be expended.

That being the case, it seems to me we might in this one instance recognize the opinion of the Committee on Indian Affairs. We may differ with it on other occasions, and very likely we shall with reference to matters upon this bill, but here is a case where I am willing to follow the judgment of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which certainly I believe has investigated this question more carefully than has the Committee on Appropriations.

I do not see why the Senator from South Dakota, as chairman of the committee, representing the Committee on Indian Affairs, should have allowed himself to be overruled on this question by the formidable committee of which he finds himself a member at the present session. It seems to me he should speak right out here in favor of what he believes ought to be appropriated in this case.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations promise that we shall have the remainder of the money next December, after the Presidential election.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Connecticut makes a very wise suggestion. I shall do a great many things, I have no doubt, next year after the Presidential election. We always do.

It does not require any very great investigation to determine whether we ought to appropriate $200,000 or $300,000 in this case. A year or two ago it seemed to be necessary that the survey should be made quickly, and if my recollection serves me correctly the Committee on Indian Affairs last year recommended that we should appropriate $500,000 or $600,000, I have forgotten which, to complete the survey in the Indian Territory. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] can tell me if I am mistaken as to the amount.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. When the first recommendation was made, something like a year ago, the estimate made by the Geological Survey was that the survey could be completed, I think, for $425,000. After some examination it was ascertained that the amount necessary would be larger, and now it is thought to be $500,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Last year the Committee on Appropriations recommended and the two Houses agreed to an appropriation of $200,000 to progress with the survey in the Indian Territory, in anticipation that it would be a reasonable sum to be applied to this purpose in connection with the other sums that are annually applied to public surveys. This year those in charge of this subject as administrative officers of the Government recommended an additional $200,000, and that sum is found in the Book of Estimates.

As a concession to those who think, and there are a good many people who so think, that the survey should be made at the earliest practicable moment, the Committee on Appropriations, in recommending the appropriation of the sum fixed in the estimate, authorized that it should be made immediately available. So it is proposed to have the $200,000 for the current year and the $200,000 for next year lap over upon each other, so that there shall be no hiatus in the work.

It is proposed now that we shall increase the amount beyond the estimates. I do not think that is a wise thing to do. A point of order, I think, would lie against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment. I do not propose to make it, but it seems to me that if we go beyond the estimates, which are very large as to these various appropriations, we will find some difficulty in meeting the expenditures. So far as I have been able to judge, there is not the necessity for haste as to surveys suggested by the Senator from Arkansas. I do not believe it is possible, with the legislation which is to be proposed before we finish the pending bill, shortly to get the Indian Territory into a condition where allotments can be made to the Indians, and that is the object of this hasty survey, in order that we may tear up by the roots, as it were, the Indian Territory, and compel the Five Civilized Tribes to take allotments of land in the Territory, and make such disposition as Congress may see fit to provide as respects the remainder.

I believe that in the matter of surveys it would be wise to make haste slowly. The Indians of the Territory are utterly opposed to the legislation which we are likely to put upon the bill before we get through with it. I submit that there is no such necessity for haste as requires that we shall expend in the present and the next fiscal year $300,000 for this single purpose. It may be that when next winter comes, if we find that the work is progressing fairly well and that an additional hundred thousand dollars can be used wisely early in the season or even during the next fiscal year, we can appropriate an additional sum and make it immediately available, as this is to be made immediately available.

I suggest to my friend the Senator from Arkansas not to press too hard the question of making surveys of these Indian lands so as to complete them in great haste. I have no doubt the Geological Survey is making a very good survey of the Territory in every particular, but I submit that $200,000, making $400,000 which may be expended within a period of eighteen months for this purpose, in consideration of the other things which we are to do or which probably we will do during the present session, is a sufficient sum of money, especially when the Five Civilized Tribes do not desire that this work shall be hastened.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not like to differ with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but I am myself satisfied that $300,000 can be expended and that it will be in the interest of economy to give $300,000 instead of $200,000. Unless the sum be made immediately available the surveys would have to cease. There is no money to run them until July. They will then have this summer and next winter, and by the following spring the work ought to be done.

It can be done much more cheaply by the appropriation of $300,000 than it can with $200,000. It can be done much more cheaply in winter time than in summer. Winter is the proper time to make the surveys. In the first place, a good portion of that country is covered with short shrubbery or trees, which, in the summer time, when the leaves are on, necessitate cutting paths as the surveyor goes. In the winter time, when the leaves are off, he can manage without cutting.

I do not know but that it is necessary to go slowly in this matter because the question we are to determine in settling the Indian question in the Territory is an exceedingly difficult one. But it is one we can not neglect very much longer. Neither in the interest of the Indians nor in the interest of the whites can it be neglected. I know, of course, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says, that the Indians are very much opposed to these surveys. The surveys ought to have been made under our treaties years and years ago. No portion of that country except the Choctaw and Chickasaw lands has been surveyed, and the Indians are opposed to making the survey for the simple reason that a small number of Indians in the Indian Territory control everything there.

Nobody has a conception of the condition of that country who has not been there or who has not at least followed the report of the commissioners who have been sent there. There are at least, I suppose, five white men in the Territory to every Indian, and the country is now divided up and parceled out to tenants. One man, who is married to an Indian wife, has 400 farms in that country rented to white people. Another, who is an Indian by birth and blood, admitted to me that he had 160 farms from which he was drawing rent. The common Indian, the full-blooded Indian, is living in the brush somewhere cultivating perhaps 4 or 5 or 10 acres at the most and keeping a few cattle. These other Indians are getting rich, and they are becoming so at the expense of the great body of the Indians of that country. This land was given to the Indians for the benefit of all and not of a few, and unless some system is devised, unless the Government of the United States puts its strong hand upon the people there, the few are to take all the profits and all the advantages and all the benefits that the Government intended to confer upon all, and the masses will get nothing.

I know, Mr. President, that it is a difficult question. You have to tear up the treaties by the roots, but you have to do it. You can not go along in that way with three or four hundred thousand white people there, who are denied every privilege of citizenship, who are denied access to the schools, who are strangers in a strange land, their children growing up in ignorance. When the Indians of the Territory opened the country to white people, they abandoned the exclusive privilege which the Government had undertaken to guarantee, that they might remain there isolated and alone, and if they have broken faith with the Government they can not complain if the Government now says, "We will recognize a condition which you have brought upon the country by your own conduct."

I believe that those Indians should be protected in every dollar of property that they have. I would have nothing to do with any measure that does not maintain strict justice on the part of the United States with reference to their property rights, but the political question is one which we have to settle not only as to the Indians in the Territory, but with respect to the whites, and, as was said by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], the very first step is to divide up the lands.

Mr. President, if I had my way I would consult these Indians as to how they should be dealt with. But they have declined for two years to even consult with our commission that we sent there. They declined to participate in the settlement of this question, and, as I said to some of them two years ago, I say now, if they decline to assist us in settling this difficult question we shall be bound to settle it for ourselves without their aid.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is a just man and I am perfectly satisfied that when the amendment which is to be proposed later to the bill comes up for consideration and the facts are presented to the Senate, as they will be presented by gentlemen who have devoted their time to the full and careful examination of this question, he will not believe then that it is our duty to make haste slowly in undertaking to change the condition of things that now exist in the Indian Territory.

Mr. ALLISON. If I made that statement, I did not wish to be so understood.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. I said that it was wise as respects these surveys—I alluded only to the surveys—not to go so rapidly when in the very nature of things it will be impossible for us to deal wholly with this question the present fiscal year.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That statement is strictly true. It will be impossible for us to deal with the question during this year, but before we can begin to deal with the question in an intelligent way there must be a survey of the country. It is the preliminary step, as stated by the Senator from Colorado. It is absolutely necessary. It will be the first thing done, and it ought to be completed at the earliest possible day. With $300,000 appropriated in this bill the survey can be completed during the calendar year, in my opinion, and during the next year steps can be inaugurated which will result in settling this question. But if we delay the survey through another year, then anything proposed must necessarily be delayed at least twelve months more.

It seems to me that motives of humanity require that there shall be no delay in this step to be taken. The condition of things existing there, as stated by the Senator from Colorado, is absolutely almost incredible. Those lands are held by a favored few in enormous tracts. They are renting them to white men who are living among the Indians, and those who are the owners of that country, who are entitled to its possession and use, are absolutely deprived of its use. There are lists which can be submitted here to show the names of individuals who hold probably from 5,000 to 40,000 acres each, while hundreds and thousands of Indians, who are Indians by blood and who are entitled to an equal share in the use of the land under treaties with the United States, who have the plighted faith of the Government of the United States that they shall have and enjoy equal rights in the Territory, have absolutely no rights at all. It is a disgrace to this Congress that that condition of things is allowed to exist, and the longer it exists the worse it is for them and for us.

I sincerely hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will allow a sufficient sum of money to be appropriated to complete the surveys during this year.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I do not undertake to express an opinion as to the large question of the policy which should be adopted in dealing with the Indian Territory. I confine myself to the narrower question whether these lands shall or shall not be surveyed.

When the Senator from Iowa says that more is being given here than the estimate, my answer is that it is for Congress to determine what the policy shall be with reference to these surveys, how fast they shall proceed, how much they shall be delayed; and when I find that the Committee on Indian Affairs of this body has determined that it is wise and expedient to expedite the surveys the fact that the Department has not expected to expend so large a sum as $300,000 during the coming year has no weight with me.

I accept the conclusion of the Committee on Indian Affairs that these surveys ought to be expedited, and I am convinced by the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] and by the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] that whatever policy is pursued with reference to these Indians, however rapidly or however slowly we proceed in solving the troublesome questions that exist in reference to the Territory, the survey, the policy of making which has been already determined upon, ought to proceed with all possible rapidity, and upon that idea and that idea alone I shall give my vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the committee.

I think the Senator from Iowa will concede, without reference to the amount that may have been estimated for by the Department, that when a committee of this body charged especially with this subject comes to the conclusion that the surveys ought to be expedited by the appropriation of a larger sum of money, it is not a sound argument for the Senator to make that because he is opposed to the policy which is proposed for adoption, to follow as the result of the surveys, the surveys themselves ought to be crippled by an inadequate appropriation. I do not think the Senator from Iowa really meant that that was his motive in resisting the appropriation. If he did mean it, I simply say I dissent from it, and wish to vote according to the merits of the proposition how much money can be wisely expended in carrying out the policy which has been determined upon, of expediting the surveys, and whether I am in favor of or am against the policy that is to follow the surveys I am not willing, as the Senator says he is willing, to hinder the surveys and make them proceed more slowly than they would otherwise proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out, in line 10, the word "continuation" and inserting the word "completion"; so as to read:

For the completion of the survey of the lands in the Indian Territory, $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is right.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I also move to amend the amendment on page 54 by striking out the word "act," in line 1, and inserting the word "paragraph"; and I move the same amendment in line 5. These provisions were taken bodily from a section, I believe, of a bill that is now pending on our Calendar, and in remodeling the pending bill so as to place it in harmony with the appropriation the word "act" was inserted, I suppose accidentally.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee, striking out the word "act" and inserting the word "paragraph" in the lines indicated.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 54, after line 7, to insert:

In payment, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to certain Chippewa Indian allottees of the Isabella Reservation, in Michigan, as their interests may appear, being the sums recovered by the United States as judgments against certain parties for timber depredations committed within said reservation upon lands which have been allotted and patented to individual Indians, and covered into the Treasury of the United States, $1,121.62.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 16, to insert:

That any adult Peoria or Ottawa Indian, an allottee under any act of Congress, may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, sell and convey to the Miami Town Company, a company chartered under the laws of Kansas, 40 acres of ground near Miami, Ind. T., to be used exclusively for cemetery purposes and no other: Provided, That 40 acres shall not exceed half of his or her allotment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 23, to insert:

To reimburse N. J. Cramer, of Yankton, S. Dak., amount paid by him to the United States as stumpage for 400 cords of wood furnished to the Government at Fort Bennett, S. Dak., in 1878, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, after line 3, to insert:

That the claim of the Fond du Lac band of Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior for compensation arising from the difference in area of the reservation as actually set apart to them and that provided to be set apart, under the fourth subdivision of article 2 of the treaty between the United States and the Chippewas of Lake Superior and the Mississippi, made and concluded at Lapointe, in the State of Wisconsin, on the 30th day of September, in the year 1854, proclaimed January 29, 1855, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on said court, with right of appeal as in other cases, to hear and determine the same and to award judgment against the United States for the difference between the area of the reservation actually set apart to said Indians and that provided to be set apart in said treaty, if any, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, the said action to be brought by the said Fond du Lac band of Chippewa Indians against the United States by petition, verified under oath by any duly authorized attorney for said Indians, within thirty days from the passage of this act; and the Attorney-General shall appear and answer said petition within thirty days from the filing thereof, unless the time for pleading be extended by the court for cause shown; and said action shall have precedence in said court.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this amendment in the bill in its present form ought not to be adopted. The object of the amendment is to allow a certain band of Indians, called the Fond du Lac band of Indians in Minnesota, to bring an action against the United States for the purpose of recovering a judgment at the rate of $1.25 an acre for the difference in the lands in the reservation assigned to them under the treaty of 1854 and the lands they claim they ought to have had.

I will state the reason why the amendment should not pass, at least in its present condition. In January, 1889, Congress passed an act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota. It provided for the cession and relinquishment of a good deal of their lands and for the disposal of them to the public in two methods, classing the lands into agricultural and pine lands, the agricultural lands as homesteaded at the rate of $1.25 an acre and the pine lands at public sale after an appraisal at the rate of $3 per thousand feet, and not less. The chief body of these lands constituted what was known as the Red Lake Reservation, really the property of the Red Lake tribe of Indians, who occupied it. Something like two million or two million and a half acres have been obtained under this legislation.

That act provides that all these Indian lands in Minnesota shall be disposed of in the manner I have indicated, and that the proceeds shall be divided among all the Indians equally, giving the band of Fond du Lac Indians their pro rata share with all the other Chippewa Indians in Minnesota in respect to the Red Lake Reservation lands.

Here is the clause of the act of 1889, which is germane and bears on this question:

SEC. 7. That all money accruing from the disposal of said lands in conformity with the provisions of this act shall, after deducting all the expenses of making the census, of obtaining the cession and relinquishment, of making the removal and allotments, and of completing the surveys and appraisals, in this act provided, be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of all the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota as a permanent fund, which shall draw interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, etc.

These Fond du Lac Indians are made a sharer of this fund. They not only get what their own little reservation would bring them on a sale, but they are allowed to come in with all the other Chippewa Indians in Minnesota and take their pro rata share of the proceeds of those Red Lake lands. Nearly 2,000,000 acres of those lands are now surveyed, and will be put upon the market as homesteads this spring at $1.25 an acre. There are some three or four hundred thousand acres of valuable pine land that will be sold at public sale to the highest bidder at not less than the appraised value, which can not be less than $3 per thousand feet, board measure, of the pine on the land.

If that act is honestly administered and all those lands sold and disposed of according to the letter and spirit of the act, they will produce a fund of over $3,000,000 for the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, and the Fond du Lac Indians will have their share with the other Indians. That being the case, I insist that they ought not to have authority to come in with this petty claim and seek to get a judgment against the United States for the difference between the reservation that was allotted them, a little reservation near Duluth, and what they claim they ought to have had. If they are given this right of action at all, it ought to be with the proviso that whatever benefit they get under the act of 1889, whatever income they derive from that act, shall be deducted from any claim that may be allowed as due them from the United States.

I therefore ask that the amendment be stricken out, or, if not stricken out, that it be amended so as to protect the interests of the United States. I think that whatever claim the Fond du Lac Indians may have against the United States the Government should be allowed to counterclaim the benefits which they are given under the act of 1889.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota, conceding his claim that the proceeds of the sale of the reservation at Red Lake is a compensation to these Indians for the loss of their lands, what objection there is to an adjustment?

Mr. NELSON. The amendment is not an adjustment, but it gives them something which they never had before. It takes all the Indians in Minnesota and makes them a sharer of the Red Lake lands. The chief body of lands was the Red Lake Reservation. In its original state it was over 3,000,000 acres. The Indians still reserve something like from 800,000 to 1,000,000 acres. At least 2,000,000 acres are open, and the Red Lake Indians divide the proceeds of the lands under the law of 1889. The proceeds of those 2,000,000 acres are, if I may use a slang expression, pooled for the benefit of all the Indians, and these Fond du Lac Indians come in and get their share of the proceeds of the Red Lake lands. For that reason I say that, in equity and good conscience, whatever claim the Fond du Lac Indians may have against the United States under the old treaty the United States ought to be credited and this bill ought to make provision that the United States shall be credited with all the benefits that the Fond du Lac Indians will get under the act of 1889.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. I move first to strike out this paragraph from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paragraph is an amendment inserted by the committee, and the Senator from Minnesota will accomplish his purpose by voting against the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It appears that these Indians were accorded a reservation on the St. Louis River in Minnesota some years ago; that the boundaries of their reservation were fixed by certain streams easily understood by the Indians; and that there was a clause placed in the treaty that the reservation should be bounded by these natural objects, but that it should not comprise less than 100,000 acres. The officers of the Government surveyed the reservation and confined it to an area of 100,000 acres. The Indians knew nothing about acres. They knew where a certain stream was and where certain boundaries were and where certain lakes were, but they knew nothing about the number of acres embraced. It appears that they were thus cheated out of over 100,000 acres in the reservation which they supposed they were getting.

These Indians have complained constantly of this treatment. In 1890 the Senate passed a resolution instructing the Secretary of the Interior to look into this matter and see what the Indians understood, and he reported that they understood the boundaries to be the natural objects and that they never agreed to any other boundaries than those embraced within the natural objects.

The Committee on Indian Affairs investigated the matter and reported in favor of this amendment, and it was adopted by the Committee on Appropriations. It simply provides that the Court of Claims shall look into this matter, taking into consideration all of the questions, and pass upon the question as to whether the Indians are entitled to the additional 100,000 acres of land or not, and if they are found to be entitled to it, they are to be compensated at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

It seems to me that the treaty made with regard to the Red Lake Reservation has nothing to do with this question whatever. If Congress has made some provision gratuitously to these Indians, it has nothing to do with their rights under the treaty, and the amendment of the committee ought to remain as a part of the bill.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from South Dakota if he has any objection to an adjournment at this time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to continue with the consideration of the bill until half past 5.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida submit a motion?

Mr. CALL. Unless the Senator in charge of the bill is especially desirous to continue the further consideration of the bill this evening, I suggest that we may as well adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. PETTIGREW. As there seems to be a general desire on the part of Senators to adjourn, I shall not insist upon remaining in session longer.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF BOND SALES.

Mr. PEFFER. Before the motion to adjourn is put, I desire to state that the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] and myself had a conversation this afternoon with respect to the resolution proposing to investigate the bond issue, of which I have been talking to the Senate several times lately. The Senator from New York is obliged to leave the city to-morrow and is not going to return until probably next Tuesday. I ask unanimous consent for an agreement that next Tuesday, at fifteen minutes past 2 o'clock, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bond resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CALL. At what hour? Fifteen minutes past 1?

Mr. ALLEN. No; fifteen minutes past 2.

Mr. CALL. Why not take it up after the routine business?

Mr. HILL. Then it would be cut off by 2 o'clock.

Mr. CALL. All right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 9, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 8, 1896.

POSTMASTERS.

James Clyne, to be postmaster at Benicia, in the county of Solano and State of California, in the place of Frederick P. Weinman, whose commission expired December 16, 1895.

William F. Mariante, to be postmaster at San Leandro, in the county of Alameda and State of California, in the place of Charles H. Gray, whose commission expired December 16, 1895.

Weston L. Stiles, to be postmaster at Suffield, in the county of Hartford and State of Connecticut, in the place of Richard Jobes, whose commission expired February 27, 1895.

Theodore Trowbridge, to be postmaster at Decatur, in the county of Van Buren and State of Michigan, in the place of May F. Nicholson, whose commission expired December 16, 1895, Edward Arnold having been nominated through a clerical error, instead of Theodore Trowbridge, and confirmed by the Senate, but not commissioned.

James McCarty, to be postmaster at Rockville Center, in the county of Queens and State of New York, in the place of John T. Davison, whose commission expired December 17, 1895.

John H. Keelin, to be postmaster at East Greenwich, in the county of Kent and State of Rhode Island, in the place of J. Clarence Reeve, whose commission expired February 23, 1896.

C. C. Lockett, to be postmaster at Kerrville, in the county of Kerr and State of Texas, in the place of Albert Endere, whose commission expired December 23, 1895.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 8, 1896.

GOVERNOR OF ARIZONA.

Benjamin J. Franklin, of Phœnix, Ariz., to be governor of Arizona.

POSTMASTERS.

Isaac O. Epes, to be postmaster at Blackstone, in the county of Nottoway and State of Virginia.

J. A. B. Bear, to be postmaster at Paola, in the county of Miami and State of Kansas.

Charles Laurence, to be postmaster at Owosso, in the county of Shiawassee and State of Michigan.

George W. Merrill, to be postmaster at Orange, in the State of Massachusetts.

Mollie E. Goolsby, to be postmaster at Chatham, in the county of Pittsylvania and State of Virginia.

Richard P. Nelson, to be postmaster at Juneau, in the Territory of Alaska.

I. B. Barnes, to be postmaster at Ferndale, in the county of Humboldt and State of California.

Mary Hansborough, to be postmaster at University, in the county of Los Angeles and State of California.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 8, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

METRIC SYSTEM.

The SPEAKER. The House is now acting under the previous question——

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put——

The SPEAKER. The House is now acting under the previous question, which has been ordered upon the House bill 7251, relating to the metric system, and the question now pending is whether the House will order the vote to be taken by the yeas and nays. Now, the gentleman from New York——

Mr. FISCHER. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to make a proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his request.

Mr. FISCHER. My request is that I may be allowed to interpose an amendment to this bill. I was cut off by the previous question being ordered, and I have since conferred with the chairman of the committee, and unless there is objection I ask that I may be allowed to propose an amendment, which is to strike out the word "only" in the third line of the second section of this bill, which will leave the measure so that if adopted it shall be the legal system of weights and measures, and leave it optional; whereas by leaving in the word it makes it the only legal system. I ask unanimous consent to offer that amendment.

Mr. BARRETT. I shall object unless it be made "a" legal measure instead of "the."

Mr. FISCHER. It is to-day by the law of 1866.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made; and the question is, Shall the vote be taken by the yeas and nays?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 116, not voting 119; as follows:

YEAS—119.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I have voted, but being paired with my colleague, Mr. CULBERSON, I desire to withdraw my vote. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay" and I would vote "yea."

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I would like to vote "nay" if I could be permitted, but I do not know that I can be, as I was not in the Hall when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not within the rule.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea," but I find that I am paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CRISP, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I was with the Committee on the Judiciary, which is privileged to sit during the sessions of the House, and I came down as soon as I was notified that a roll call was pending. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain the gentleman's request.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Was not my absence privileged, the committee having leave to sit during the sessions of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Well, if I could be permitted to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS]. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I am entitled to vote, as I was not present in the Hall when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's vote can not be received.

The following-named members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. WHITE with Mr. HARRISON.
Mr. LORIMER with Mr. HUTCHESON.
Mr. HICKS with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.
Mr. TRACEWELL with Mr. HENDRICK.
Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. RUSK.
Mr. MORSE with Mr. PRICE.
Mr. JOY with Mr. COX.
Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania with Mr. HALL.
Mr. MCCLURE with Mr. MINER of New York.
Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania with Mr. WILSON of South Carolina.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri with Mr. NEILL.
Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. FITZGERALD.
Mr. DALZELL with Mr. CRISP.
Mr. LOUD with Mr. KYLE.
Mr. STEWART of Wisconsin with Mr. STALLINGS.
Mr. RANEY with Mr. COWEN.
Mr. DRAPER with Mr. TUCKER.
Mr. ANDREWS with Mr. MILES.
Mr. CROWTHER with Mr. LAYTON.
Mr. MILLER of West Virginia with Mr. WOODARD.
Mr. HENDERSON with Mr. ABBOTT.
Mr. SOUTHWICK with Mr. SORG.
Mr. CODDING with Mr. JONES until April 11.
Mr. BOUTELLE with Mr. TATE for this day.

For this vote:

Mr. BURTON of Missouri with Mr. SPENCER.
Mr. SHANNON with Mr. DOWNING.
Mr. PENDLETON with Mr. CULBERSON.
Mr. KULP with Mr. MADDOX.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there has been a good deal of confusion, I think it desirable to have a recapitulation of the vote.

The Clerk recapitulated the vote.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

The name of Mr. DOCKERY was again called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to change my vote from "yea" to "nay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

[Applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. MCMILLIN. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote just taken. As many as are in favor of laying the motion to reconsider on the table will, when their names are called, answer "aye;" those opposed, "no."

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOCKERY. A vote in the negative would be a vote in opposition to the bill, as I understand the present parliamentary situation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is so.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 111, nays 133, not voting 110; as follows:

Culberson,	Kirkpatrick,	Raney,
Cummings,	Kulp,	Reyburn,

So the House refused to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The following additional pairs were announced:

On this vote:

Mr. PENDLETON with Mr. CULBERSON.
Mr. DINGLEY with Mr. SPENCER.
Mr. REYBURN with Mr. MCCULLOCH.

For this day:

Mr. BEACH with Mr. BANKHEAD.
Mr. BULL with Mr. STOKES.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GROUT). The question now is, Shall the vote by which this bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time be reconsidered?

Mr. FISCHER and Mr. HURLEY called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, what is the question upon which we are now to vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is whether the vote by which this bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time shall be reconsidered. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DOCKERY. As I understand the parliamentary situation, it is this: Those who are opposed to the bill vote in the affirmative on this motion, and those in favor of the bill vote in the negative.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, but was interrupted by Mr. WHEELER. Will the Chair explain to the House the effect of the vote on this question—what an "aye" vote means and what a "no" vote means?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has stated the question, and thinks gentlemen ought to understand how to vote on it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I find there is some uncertainty among members as to the effect of a vote "aye" or "no" on this question. I think the matter ought to be again stated by the Chair. As I understand, those who are opposed to the bill vote in favor of reconsidering the vote by which it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and those in favor of the bill vote "no."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The statement of the gentleman from Maine is correct, as the Chair understands it.

Mr. HOPKINS. What was the statement? We did not hear it.

Mr. OTEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Shall the vote by which this bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time be reconsidered? Of course those who are in favor of reconsideration vote "aye"; and that vote, as the Chair supposes, would be against the bill, or would at least be in favor of another opportunity to take the sense of the House upon the question whether the bill should be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BARRETT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will proceed with the roll call. Will gentlemen please be quiet, that the responses may be heard.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I undertook a few moments ago to put a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair, but there was so much noise I could not make myself heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. OTEY. I should like to know whether those who oppose this bill should vote "aye" or "no" on this question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that an affirmative vote on this question now before the House would be in opposition to the bill, and a negative vote would practically be in favor of the bill. The Clerk will proceed with the roll call.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nays 99, not voting 112; as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. PENDLETON with Mr. CULBERSON on this vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Have we not passed that stage?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not yet; that is the question which now recurs.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the reconsideration of this vote takes the bill, as I understand, from under the operation of the previous question, and it is now open for debate and amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DOCKERY. Debate is not in order.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, yes; the previous question has been exhausted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is open, the Chair understands now, to debate or amendment. The previous question has spent itself, and the question now is, the Chair repeats, open for discussion or amendment, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE] has been recognized.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the Chair will permit me just a moment. The previous question is operating upon the bill to its passage——

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. No; only to the engrossment and third reading, and it has spent its force.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands, and the question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, upon which the previous question has been exhausted. It is now open to discussion and amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I respectfully protest against the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. DOCKERY. Why, certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The ruling has been made in this House within the last two weeks, where a bill had been defeated. There the previous question had been ordered and had exhausted itself when the question of reconsideration was before the House. That is to say, the previous question had reached its end and the bill was before the House for such action as it might see proper. But when the only question reconsidered is, Shall the bill pass? that is the only question under consideration. The previous question is still operating on the bill, and debate or amendment would certainly not be in order as long as the previous question is operative.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. This vote was not on the passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will read a paragraph from the Digest which bears directly upon the point:

When a vote, taken under the operation of the previous question, is reconsidered, the question is then divested of the operation of the previous question and is open for debate and amendment. * * * These decisions apply only to cases where the previous question was fully exhausted by votes taken on all the questions covered by it before the motion to reconsider was made. In any other case the pendency of the previous question would preclude debate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. May I ask what was the first vote taken this morning?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then we have not yet voted upon the passage?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not yet; that stage of the bill has not been reached.

Mr. LACEY. If the Chair will permit me, the Digest further along, just at the point where the Chair was reading, shows a change in the rule and consequently a change in the practice in that regard. It says:

But such motion is not debatable under the practice which prevailed for many years,

Calling attention to the fact that this change of practice has been sanctioned by rulings since the Twenty-seventh Congress.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. That is in reference to a motion to reconsider, which, of course, is not debatable.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think the decision of the Chair was given under a misapprehension of facts, and I have no doubt that on examination he will reverse his ruling.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the previous question had been ordered on the passage of the bill, then the position taken by the Chair would, unquestionably, be wrong. The Chair was informed that the previous question was ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and upon that ground the Chair sees no reason for changing his ruling.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. That is correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House acted upon the matter on yesterday, and the RECORD will show the fact.

Mr. DOCKERY. But waiving that—although I think the Chair is in error—the RECORD will disclose the fact that the previous question was ordered generally, and went to the engrossment and third reading and passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal, and it does not show that the previous question was ordered on the passage of the bill. It speaks of the state which the bill had reached and says, "The previous question was then ordered" and stops there. The Chair thinks the previous question only extended to the third reading of the bill, as that was the only question then before the House. The Chair still adheres to the ruling made. Perhaps, however, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if he is heard for a moment, will bring the matter to a conclusion.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. If the House will bear with me, I simply desire to state the present position, and for the purpose of saving time and avoiding motions for amendments or debate, and perhaps further roll calls. This bill having come up on the call of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it from the consideration of the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. The bill having taken up the time of the House for practically two days, we had better finally dispose of it now.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not object.

Mr. DOCKERY. We have spent two days on it and might as well dispose of it. If we send it back to the committee it can come up again at any time. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Is objection made to my request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Then, in order to enable the bill to receive proper consideration, as far as its form is concerned, because the gentleman from New York desires to amend it——

Mr. STEELE. He voted for it, all the same.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE (continuing). I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I demand the previous question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We do not need the previous question. If everybody agrees to its going back, let it go back to the committee.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Let it go back to the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on recommitting the bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DOCKERY) there were—ayes 130, noes 59.

Accordingly the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills and joint resolution were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 888) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company," approved March 2, 1892—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Joint resolution (S. R. 112) donating a condemned cannon and some shells to the Guilford Battle Ground Company, near Greensboro, N. C.—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 250) for the relief of W. H. L. Pepperell—to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1853) for the relief of Edward Rice; and Joint resolution (S. R. 123) directing the Secretary of War to submit a plan and estimate for the improvement of the Nebraska side of the Missouri River, opposite Sioux City, Iowa.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (S. 249) granting a pension to Charles E. Jones; and Joint resolution (S. R. 116) "authorizing the Public Printer to print the Annual Report of the Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in quarto form, and to bind in one volume."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5161) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 569) granting a pension to Sophia J. Hamilton, widow of Charles S. Hamilton, major-general of volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 1499) to correct the muster of Lieut. Gilman L. Johnson; and

A bill (H. R. 6425) for the relief of Clifton R. Anderson.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following House concurrent resolutions:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound in paper covers 25,000 additional copies of Bureau of Education circular of information No. 200, catalogue of the American Literary Association Library, 5,000 copies for the Senate, 10,000 copies for the House of Representatives, and 10,000 copies for the Bureau of Education.

Also:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print, for distribution by the Department of State, 2,500 copies of Commercial Relations for 1894 and 1895, and (in separate form) 10,000 copies of the "Review of the world's commerce," etc., being pages 1 to 235, inclusive, of said Commercial Relations.

Also:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 additional copies of the Report of the Director of the Mint for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 5,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Director of the Mint.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 181 of the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, being the report of the delegates of the United States to the Fifth International Prison Congress held at Paris, France, in July, 1895; 1,000 copies for the Senate, 2,000 copies for the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for distribution by the Secretary of State.

CHICKAMAUGA AND CHATTANOOGA NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will only take a minute.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on the dedication of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park be, and they are hereby, authorized to expend the sum of $100 for stenographic work, typewriting, and copying, in the compilation of their report of the dedicatory exercises, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FOG SIGNAL, MENOMINEE, MICH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 5363) authorizing the construction of a fog signal on the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor, Wisconsin, with an amendment striking out the word "Wisconsin" and inserting the word "Michigan" in the body of the bill and in the title.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

RAILROADS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 5672) to grant to railroad companies in Indian Territory additional powers to secure depot grounds, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what disposition of this bill is desired by the gentleman in charge of it, and if there be no objection, it may be presented to-morrow.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask that the bill lie upon the table until to-morrow.

There was no objection.

AMERICAN SAILING VESSELS IN THE COASTING TRADE.

Mr. PAYNE. I am directed by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to call up the bill (H. R. 2673) to remove discriminations against American sailing vessels in the coasting trade.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, calls up in the morning hour a bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2673) to remove discriminations against American sailing vessels in the coasting trade.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it was my purpose to ask the House to vote upon this bill this afternoon, but the consideration of the last bill has taken so much time that gentlemen on the other side are desirous to have the time for debate extended. I should like to have it fixed now, so that we can know when we can vote. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. COOPER] has some suggestion to offer.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. We only desire to have a reasonable time to discuss the bill. It is a very important one and affects the ports represented by gentlemen from a number of districts. I have consulted with members on the floor, and it seems to me that the least time in which we could have adequate discussion of this bill would be to fix the time to vote at 2 o'clock to-morrow. I am willing to do that, and make that proposition.

Mr. PAYNE. I am willing to do that, and to have the previous question considered as ordered at 2 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks that the vote be taken at 2 o'clock to-morrow, the bill to be considered during the remainder of to-day and until 2 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I presume it is understood that the time will be controlled by the chairman of the committee [Mr. PAYNE] and by myself as making the minority report.

The SPEAKER. That will be as gentlemen agree.

Mr. PAYNE. There will be no objection to dividing the time equally and to having the negative controlled by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. COOPER].

The SPEAKER. That will have to be done by consent of the House. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. COOPER] asks that the time may be evenly divided, one-half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from New York. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. I desire to have the bill read first.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4442 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following: "Whenever the master or mate of a sailing vessel of the United States employed in the coastwise trade, claiming to be a skillful pilot, offers himself for a license, the inspectors shall make diligent inquiry as to his character and merits, and, if satisfied, from personal examination of the applicant, with the proof that he offers, that he possesses the requisite knowledge and skill and is trustworthy and faithful, they shall grant him a license for the term of one year to pilot any such vessel within the limits prescribed in the license; but such license shall be suspended or revoked upon satisfactory evidence of negligence, unskillfulness, inattention to the duties of his station, or intemperance, or the willful violation of any of the provisions of this title."

SEC. 2. That section 4444 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4444. No State or municipal government shall impose upon pilots of vessels any obligation to procure a State or other license in addition to that issued by the United States, or any other regulation which will impede such pilots in the performance of the duties required by this title; nor shall any pilot charges be levied by any such authority upon any vessel piloted as provided by this title, nor upon any vessel of the United States employed in the coastwise trade being towed into or out of any port of the United States by a steam vessel under command of a pilot licensed for such port under the laws of the United States; and in no case shall the fees charged for the pilotage of any vessel exceed the customary or legally established rates in the State where the same is performed. Nothing in this title shall be construed to annul or affect any regulation established by the laws of any State requiring vessels entering or leaving a port in any such State, other than coastwise vessels, to take a pilot duly licensed or authorized by the laws of such State, or of a State situate upon the waters of such State."

SEC. 3. That section 4237 be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4237. No regulations or provisions shall be adopted by any State which shall make any discrimination in the rate of pilotage or half pilotage between vessels sailing between the ports of one State and vessels sailing between the ports of different States, or any discrimination against vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam or sail, or against national vessels of the United States, and all existing regulations or provisions making any such discrimination are annulled and abrogated."

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect six months after its passage.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is well stated in its title—to remove discriminations against American sailing vessels in the coasting trade. The discriminations are these: Steam vessels sailing under the American flag and engaged in the coasting trade are not obliged to pay pilotage fees unless they require and have the services of pilots. On the other hand, sailing vessels under the American flag engaged in the coasting trade are required by the laws of nine States of this Union to pay pilotage fees whenever entering ports of those States, whether they require the services of a pilot or not; whether the pilot puts foot on board the vessel or not. This anomaly in the law has grown up under the provisions of the law of the United States passed in 1789, which provides:

Until further provision is made by Congress, all pilots in the bays, inlets, rivers, harbors, and ports of the United States shall continue to be regulated in conformity with the existing laws of the States, respectively, wherein such pilots may be and under such laws as the States may respectively enact for that purpose.

It will be observed right here that Congress reserved the right, which it would have without any express reservation under the statute, and also gave notice that the pilotage laws were to be regulated by the legislatures of the States until further provision is made by Congress. So I take it that no question will be raised here as to the right of Congress or on the ground of any question of State rights to preserve these discriminations.

This law of Congress remained substantially unchanged until 1871, when Congress exempted all steam vessels bearing the American flag and engaged in the coasting trade from the payment of compulsory pilotage. It left it voluntary with these vessels and with the masters of these vessels to make an agreement with the local pilot for pilotage on entering the port. Previous to this many of the States had made no regulation by law whatever. Others had required a uniform system of fees, placing it both upon the foreign and domestic vessels. Of course in 1789 sailing into the harbors and the different ports of the United States was a very different thing from what it is to-day. During the century we have spent millions upon millions of dollars in improving the entrances to those harbors, in making the road in and the road out, so that in many of them the entrance is as well defined as Pennsylvania avenue for the ordinary traveler. Another condition of affairs has resulted in the course of this time, and that is that vessels, instead of sailing in, are enabled, by the system of tugboats that has been established at every port, to employ a tugboat on which there is an experienced pilot, licensed under the laws of the United States, not only to haul the vessel within the harbor, but the pilot is competent to guide the vessel as well as the boat in safety into the inlet of the port.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do not the pilots that have to be paid have tugboats of their own?

Mr. PAYNE. Not generally.

Mr. STEPHENSON. They have sailing boats.

Mr. PAYNE. So that it often happens——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Who licenses that pilot on the tugboat?

Mr. PAYNE. I hope that gentlemen will allow me to complete my statement without propounding questions, and I believe they will gather the information they desire from my statement, and if not, at the conclusion of my remarks I will be glad to yield for questions.

Under this system it has come to pass that sailing vessels generally employ these tugboats. But under the laws of 9 States, in addition to paying the tugboats, they are obliged to pay the pilot also. He sometimes goes on board and rides in as a passenger; sometimes he goes on board and directs the master of the vessel to follow the tugboat; and sometimes he does not go on board at all, but simply meets the vessel at the wharf to demand his pilotage; and often the pilotage paid for these vessels exceeds the sum paid for the services of the tugboat in conducting the vessel into the harbor. I say there are 9 States which compel sailing vessels to pay pilotage fees—the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. Until recently the State of Maryland also exacted those compulsory fees, but on the 11th day of last month a law was passed by the State of Maryland exempting coastwise sailing vessels from the payment of compulsory pilotage. So that there are but 9 States left which compel this exaction and this tax upon sailing vessels.

Formerly the New England States, my own State, and the State of New Jersey, exacted these compulsory fees; but they have long since been abolished by positive enactment of the legislatures of those States. In 36 of the States there are no compulsory pilotage fees. Some of them are inland States, and many of them border on the Great Lakes, on our seacoast, on the rivers—the Mississippi, the Missouri, and the great rivers—where there is often need of pilots to manage their whole system of inland navigation. These States compel no master to employ a pilot, or to pay any tax in case he does not employ a pilot, and they are still maintaining their system.

The State of Virginia says by its law that if a vessel will pay 10 cents per ton on her tonnage as an annual license she may navigate any of the waters and ports of Virginia without a pilot and without the assistance of a pilot. In other words, it is perfectly safe for a vessel in the coastwise trade to enter any port in the State of Virginia if she begins by paying a tax of 10 cents a ton upon the tonnage. That hardly amounts to as much as the pilotage fee for a single entrance and departure, but it is "safe" in such a case for the vessel to enter any of the ports of Virginia without a licensed pilot. There is a similar provision, not quite so liberal, in Georgia. The law of that State provides that by paying a tax of 25 cents per ton and one fee an annual license will be given, not to the master or to the mate of the vessel, but to the vessel itself. Whoever may sail her in, it is perfectly safe for that vessel to enter any port in the State of Georgia by paying a tax.

A MEMBER. Paying it to the State?

Mr. PAYNE. No; to the association of pilots. In Alabama it is not safe for a vessel to enter a port of that State without paying full pilotage fees unless she pays one-half fee and sails in without a pilot. If a vessel pays the pilotage fees she is permitted by the laws of Alabama to enter any port of that State without a pilot licensed either by the State board or by any board of the United States. The law of Texas is similar. If a vessel pays one-half fee she can enter and navigate any of the ports of that State without a pilot.

Mr. KEM. Do I understand the gentleman to say that these fees are paid to the association of pilots?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; to the association of pilots in each port.

Mr. KEM. The fees are not paid to the State?

Mr. PAYNE. No; to the pilots. In South Carolina it is not safe for an American vessel to enter any port in that State, no matter how competent the master or the mate may be without paying pilotage fees if the vessel has started from the port of another State, but she can enter with perfect safety if she has started from some other port in the State of South Carolina and she is exempt from any fee. So we see that in six of these States, by acts of the State legislatures, it is perfectly safe to sail in a vessel without the assistance of a local pilot or of a United States pilot, provided the vessels conform to certain conditions and pay certain moneys as a tax upon their tonnage. Let us see how this works. For twenty-five years steam vessels engaged in American carrying trade have been exempt from this exaction of pilotage fees, and yet those steam vessels come into direct competition with the sailing vessels engaged in the same coasting trade. Sailing vessels are required to pay a pilotage tax when they enter these ports, and these annual taxes, burdensome as they are, being a direct tax upon commerce, are a small matter compared with the actual pilotage fees that are exacted in a State like South Carolina, where sometimes it occurs that the pilotage fee is equal to more than one-third of the net receipts for freight for the entire voyage.

A gentleman from Connecticut told me of a case that had come under his personal observation where the pilotage fees paid at Charleston were more than the entire freight receipts for the voyage. That did not appear before the committee; the other fact did. The gentleman who made the statement is the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY]. It has often happened—and that was the testimony given before the committee—that the pilotage fees, even where the pilot did not lift his hand, were very oppressive. There was one case mentioned where the pilot got on the vessel at the wharf and had such confidence in the pilot on the steam tug which was towing the vessel out of the harbor that he got into a hammock and fell asleep, so that the master had actually to wake him up from his nap in order to get him off onto the tug.

Mr. CLARDY. By what authority are these fees fixed?

Mr. PAYNE. The State legislature generally fixes the fees; that is, it fixes a maximum, and the maximum is generally lived up to, though not always. I have been requested by a gentleman sitting near me [Mr. HENDERSON] to say something about the amount of these fees. I have before me a law of the State of Virginia, which provides that vessels drawing 10 feet and under shall pay $2.50 per foot for entering a harbor; that would be $25 for entering and $25 for going out. A vessel drawing over 16 feet is required to pay $4.50 per foot, which would make $72 for entering and the same for going out. Of course, up to 20 or 24 feet the proportion is much greater. In North Carolina a vessel drawing 6 feet and under 6½ pays $18. Graduated up from 18 feet to 18½, it pays $143 for entering and the same for leaving the port. South Carolina, 6 feet draft or under, $15; 18 feet or under, $130; each additional 60 inches above 18 feet, the further sum of $10. These classifications go up into a draft of 28 feet, amounting to $230.

Mr. HENDERSON. Going out and going in?

Mr. PAYNE. Going out and in at the port of Charleston, S. C.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Each way?

Mr. PAYNE. Each way; so much for going in and so much for going out.

At Savannah, Ga.: Six feet draft or under, bar pilotage and to Cockspur, $10.76; from Cockspur to Savannah, $6.46; total, $17.22; 24 feet, $210 to go in and $210 to go out.

At Brunswick, Ga.: Six feet or under, $16.75; 23 feet or under, $195.

St. Marys: Eighteen and one-half feet, $92.50.

Alabama—Mobile: Twenty-two and one-half feet, $135.

Florida: Over 20 feet, $6 per foot.

Louisiana: Bar, per foot draft each way, $4.50; river, regular rate, $60; under contract sometimes done for $40.

Texas—Galveston: Pilotage $4 per foot draft.

I have not time to read all these figures, but I think from what I have read the House will get some slight idea of the amount of the tax that is put upon these sailing vessels in their struggle to maintain an existence against the steam vessels. Perhaps I ought to say a word as to the decline of the sailing vessels.

The total number of sailing vessels bearing the American flag has declined from over 28,000 in 1874 to 17,000 in 1895. On the Atlantic and Gulf coasts there are over 12,000 American sailing vessels, 4,000 of which are over 50 tons. These are engaged in competition with 2,000 steam vessels of over 40 tons.

Right here I want to make a suggestion, because it has been claimed that this bill will operate to deprive the poor man of his chance to make a livelihood; that it is in favor of the rich vessel owner. Now, the fact of the business is that but very few steam vessels belong to anybody who has not a competence. If there are any vessel owners who are rich more than others it is the owners of steam vessels. But very often—almost uniformly—it is the case that a sailing vessel is the product of a joint venture, five, ten, twenty, thirty men clubbing together and putting in their savings—often mortgaging their property—generally to help one of their number to the means of making a livelihood by sailing the vessel. And the owners of these sailing vessels, who are engaged in the business in this way, are generally poor men.

But it is said that the pilots are poor. Sir, I have seen a circular which I picked up——

Mr. DINGLEY. As I understand the gentleman from New York, his point is that the steam vessels are exempted from the payment of these compulsory pilotage fees——

Mr. PAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. And that the sailing vessels are compelled to pay the fees?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes, sir. As it is to-day, the rich proprietors (if you please) of the steam vessels are exempt from the payment of this tax; and the poor men who own the sailing vessels are compelled to pay it, whether they receive any service for it or not.

The House will bear in mind that the competition for the coastwise carrying trade is sharp between the sailing vessels and the steam vessels. It was in testimony before the committee that the rate of freight had been by this severe competition cut down as low as 60 cents, and even 50 cents, a ton for carrying coal from Virginia to the New England States. The man who happens to be the owner of a sailing vessel suffers directly by this competition, because he is obliged to pay pilotage fees, while the owner of the steam vessel, having his licensed pilot, can enter any of these ports without being compelled to pay a dollar; and he has the privilege of making a contract directly with the pilot, paying him a reasonable compensation for the services he may render in piloting the vessel into port.

These pilots were heard before the committee, as they have been heard before individual members of the House, for they have been in the lobbies here from the time this bill was introduced until this moment buttonholing members and presenting their side of the case. They are intelligent men. The pilots have been able to keep these intelligent men here for the purpose of explaining their side of this bill. They said it would take away from them their livelihood. And perhaps the strongest opposition to this bill came from the pilots at Pensacola, Fla., who claimed that the measure would be a peculiar hardship upon them. These pilots did not seek to enlighten the committee as to the amount of their fees. They did not volunteer any information on the subject, except that one of them from Pensacola said that there were 41 pilots on the bar there, and that they did not average much above $1,500 a year each for their services.

Mr. TALBERT. Would not the effect of this bill be to take the question of pilotage entirely out of the hands of the States, depriving them of any authority to act in regard to it, and putting the whole question under the control of the General Government?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no.

Mr. TALBERT. That was my impression. I simply put the question for information.

Mr. PAYNE. This bill leaves the States entirely free to exact compulsory pilotage of all foreign-going vessels, just as they do now, and to fix the rates that pilots shall charge on foreign-going vessels. So that if the present rates are not sufficient to maintain the system the States are entirely able to take care of it by fixing such rates upon foreign vessels as will maintain the system. Of course they can fix the rate upon any vessel whose master chooses to employ a pilot, although his vessel is engaged in the coasting trade.

I said there were 41 pilots on the bar at Pensacola. The committee made some effort to find out the amount of fees that were being received by these pilots; and Mr. R. R. Freeman, of Boston, took some pains to inquire of the collector of customs and other

United States officials to ascertain the amount of pilotage fees received from foreign vessels actually entering these ports. These were taken from the customs records; the draft of each vessel was taken from the records, and the fees figured out, the rate allowed by law and the rates charged by the Pilot Association of Pensacola, and the result was as stated in this letter.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Will the gentleman permit me one moment just there?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. These figures were never exhibited to the committee——

Mr. PAYNE. They were presented to the committee at the same time that the gentleman presented some letters from some of the Southern States bearing upon the subject, but they were not, through some oversight, printed in the printed report of the committee.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. They were never called to the attention of the committee, and so far as I have undertaken to verify them they are very wide of a correct statement of the facts.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, this statement was laid before the committee at the same time the gentleman called up some papers to which I have referred.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. What I mean is, that I never saw them. I never heard of them as being official documents before the committee. They are not correct at all events.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman is correct in stating that they were not before the committee in the sense of having been presented to his personal attention there. When the statement was presented it was submitted by myself, and I did not know what it contained.

I find, however, at Pensacola, Fla., according to the statements which come from the official custom-house records——

Mr. COOPER of Florida. If the gentleman will permit me, in the majority report it is not stated that these figures are official. The gentleman from New York stated that they were presented to some members of the committee from some source. I understand that they were prepared by a Mr. Freeman, but are not official records.

Mr. PAYNE. The paper was handed into the committee by Mr. Freeman, and is derived from the sources to which I have already referred.

Now, from these figures it appears that at Pensacola, Fla., the receipts for pilotage from foreign tonnage in the year ended June 30, 1895, was $49,221, to be divided among 41 men. This would amount to $1,200 and upward for each man. That, you will observe, relates to the pilotage fees on foreign vessels, without taking into any account the steam or sailing vessels in the coastwise trade that paid pilotage fees at that port. Mr. O'Brien, a very intelligent pilot, who appeared before the committee, stated that there had been 19 or 20 steam vessels engaged in the coastwise American trade entering that port during the year, and that they had all taken on a pilot and paid pilotage fees, and that they did it voluntarily. The amount of fees paid by these vessels the committee has no means of knowing. Mr. O'Brien stated further that the pilotage association were at some considerable expense. He said the pilot boat cost some ten or twelve thousand dollars to build, and that every two or three years it would require some repairs, new sails, etc. He did not say what the expense of the repairs would be, but if out of the $49,000 received from foreign tonnage they paid $8,000 a year in repairs, these 41 pilots would clear an income of upward of a thousand dollars a year, and evidently they would not starve under that system in the port of Pensacola.

What further do they say of this port of Pensacola? Why, that even if the compulsory system of pilotage were abolished, no sailing vessel could be sailed in by a sailing master even though skillful as a pilot; that the sand and the shoals shifted so much that the master of the vessel could not sail his vessel in, as he could not be familiar with the shifting currents and the changing conditions of the entrance to the harbor; or, in other words, that he would be compelled to employ the services of some pilot even if this bill passed. Evidently if that be true these gentlemen in Pensacola will not be cut down below the $1,500 a year which they are now receiving—41 of them—to pilot in and out of that harbor these vessels that may come there each year.

At Tampa there were but four pilots, and the fees were excessively large. The income was so great that the board of pilot commissioners of the State of Florida cut the fees down one-half, they having that power under the statute. And still these gentlemen must receive a very comfortable income; because the pilotage fees paid on foreign vessels alone in Tampa amount to over $6,000 a year, to be divided between four pilots, making $1,500 each, even if they did not receive a dollar from the American coastwise vessels.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is evident that the American sailing master can get his own vessel into the port of Charleston, he can get it into the ports of Virginia, the ports of Georgia or Alabama or Texas, without the aid of a licensed pilot, because their legislatures have solemnly declared that such was the fact. That being the case, we say that this tax, for it is nothing more or less than a tax, should be removed from the vessels—the small vessel owners—and that there should be some chance afforded to the American sailors as well as to the American pilots.

But what are the objections urged against the passage of the bill? They say it will deprive some of the pilots of their comfortable living; that it will cut down their salaries or cut down the number of pilots. Well, Mr. Speaker, if that is true, are we to tax the commerce of the country for the support of individuals? Are we to tax the American carrying trade to support comfortably some gentlemen who, under the laws of the State, constitute the pilots of that port or the pilots' association?

They say that it will destroy the value of a million dollars' worth of boats owned by these pilot associations throughout the United States. Why, they come to us from Pensacola, Fla., and say that they have already themselves destroyed the value of six pilot boats; because a few years ago they had eight boats, but they have consolidated. "Now, do not think this is a trust," says a pilot from Pensacola, "because we have consolidated, but we found that with eight boats we were eating each other up, and now we use only two boats and have an association." Forty-one pilots standing in each other's way in two boats. And what are these associations? Why, Mr. Chairman, I have a letter from Fernandina, Fla., which says:

> Now, I want to give you a little idea of the condition of things here and the close corporation that our Florida laws make for these associations. You will see by consulting our Florida law on this subject that the business of bar pilots is turned over to the association at each bar, and that business is transmitted to the heirs and family and kindred of those in position with the certainty and regularity of an English land estate. No one can be a pilot without apprenticeship of four years, and so no one but a relative in some degree of the active pilots can get into the circle. I have been familiar with the workings of the pilot business here for twenty years, and I know of nothing short of Tammany that equals it as an organization for power and plunder. The board of pilot commissioners are changed with considerable regularity, and always at the dictation of the pilots' association. That association is the most efficient for political management and influence of any or all the forces in any locality where they operate.

I can well believe this from what I have seen of it since this bill has been before our committee.

> There are 13 pilots now combined in one organization in this place. They divide among them not less than $30,000 per annum, as I am assured. Some of these are boys just out of their apprenticeship, who could not in any of the other associations of life for which their education would fit them command $40 per month. They are all of the younger descendants of the old pilots, or in some way descended from them or the relatives.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, if it will not disturb my friend, I want to know whether this pilotage is charged so much for each trip, or is that the amount they pay for one year's service to the particular boat?

Mr. PAYNE. So much for each trip. Every man who takes a pilot in one of these States pays these fees for every trip in and every trip out. Five of the States have said that by paying an annual fee the pilot need not go aboard. The owner of the vessel can sail it in and out, the fee in that case, as in the other, going directly to the pilot association. Oh, no, this is a tax every trip, and twice every trip. It is paid at the entrance and the going out, and they have to pay it every time out of the freight paid to the sailing vessel.

A specious argument is sometimes whispered in the ear of members who go out in the lobby that the sailing master puts this on his bill and that the man who pays the freight pays also the pilotage fee; but gentlemen of the House will remember that these sailing vessels come in direct competition with the steam vessels. The steam vessels are not obliged to pay it. The sailing vessels must cut down their freight to that point where they can, by deducting the amount of pilot fees, equalize what the shipper has to pay to the steam vessel, or else the sailing vessel does not get the freight. It is an absolute, discriminating tax against the sailing vessel, the sailing master, and the sailor of the sailing vessel.

I am in favor of helping the labor of this country, but not to build up a class that is fattening over the earnings of men who go out to sea.

A great deal is said about the bravery, courage, and endurance of these pilots, and I will not say a word in detraction of them. There are brave men among them, who risk their lives, for it is a dangerous occupation; but is it as dangerous as the occupation of the men who go down to the sea in ships, and who can not run into the nearby port if the storms and winds come too hard, as can these pilot boats?

Will you discriminate against the brave men who stand on the deck, who go before the mast, receiving, some of them, $10 a month and their board? Will you discriminate against that class in favor of a class of men who do not want you to cut down their annual income below $1,500, for doing a work that requires no more bravery, no more endurance, and involves no more danger than the life of a sailor?

Mr. Speaker, this bill may cut down the number of pilots in some of the Southern ports. I have seen a statement which has been sent, I think, to every member of the House except myself and perhaps some members of the committee, accusing the committee of ignorance and all that sort of thing, and stating that there are nearly 1,000 pilots in the United States. Well, the statistics may be correct; but if they are, there is only a fraction of a thousand pilots in these nine States that insist on keeping up this old and unjust discrimination. The number is small, and the percentage of them that will have to retire is very, very small. If they tell the truth, in most of these Southern ports, if you pass this bill, every sailing vessel will still be obliged for safety to hire a pilot.

Oh, but they say, it will be unsafe to life and property if you pass this bill; that there are not regulations enough to make it safe for a vessel to enter a port if they do not take one of these local pilots; that the methods of examination are not sufficiently definite to get a good man every time.

Why, Mr. Speaker, we constitute the same board to license pilots that have licensed pilots for steam vessels for the past twenty-five years, and there never has been a whisper of complaint that these boards do not do their duty as to masters licensed to act as pilots on board the steam vessels, who have carried these vessels into the harbors for twenty-five years. These pilots do not bring up the record of a single place where these men had blundered in taking their vessels into port, or had endangered property or human life. If they were capable of examining pilots and licensing them for these steam vessels, why not for sailing vessels?

Then we have added another clause to this bill which they say is not safe. We say that if there is no licensed pilot on the vessel, but if she employs a tug which has a licensed pilot on board, the vessel may go into port without paying any pilotage fees to the local pilot. These steam-tug men know the channels, know the shifting shoals and bars of the harbors. They are as capable of taking a vessel in as the pilots themselves. The pilots themselves acknowledge it, when they go on board of the vessel and trust the safety of their own lives to the pilot on the tugboat, telling the master of the vessel to follow the tugboat in. There is no danger from the enactment of this law to human life or property.

But they say that the pilotage system will go down in the Southern States; that they can not keep up on the fees on foreign commerce.

Mr. Speaker, this table shows that in 19 Southern ports the pilots receive $555,000 a year. If that is not sufficient to establish a competent system of pilots for those ports, great heavens! we had better issue more bonds and sell them or provide some other way except taking the money out of the hard earnings of these men who tread the decks of American coastwise trading vessels and work hard for what they get. What did they do at Tampa? Why, they reduced the number of pilots to 4; and 4 men do all the business. They state they would have to reduce the number at Pensacola one-half. That was the testimony of one pilot before the committee. There are 41 men at Pensacola. Well, if the 41 men at Pensacola can not get a living in dividing the $49,000 received from foreign commerce there, I suppose that 20 men will have to step outside and get into some other occupation. If they are as competent in sailing vessels and as competent pilots as they profess to be, let them take places on American vessels, beneath the American flag, as masters or mates of vessels sailing out on the seas and earn a living, even as these men earn their living to-day upon whose earnings they are levying this unjust discrimination and tax. [Applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Can you tell us the number of vessels that arrive at Pensacola each day in the year?

Mr. PAYNE. We have no statistics of that kind as to the coastwise trade. These tables give the number of foreign vessels that arrive there in a year, and they are found in the report.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should think that that would be an essential fact to know in order to judge of the necessity.

Mr. PAYNE. I find from the tables that 348 vessels entered and 317 departed in a year. That would be about one each way each day. Why, this shows that they voluntarily reduced the number of their boats from 8 to 2, and did it of their own motion. They can reduce that number still. These men at Pensacola can earn a living. They can go before the mast. They can go and take the places as masters, pilots, or mates on vessels. They can find employment. It is not argument to say there is no other way open to them except levying tribute on some other industry.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one further point I want to advert to that appeared before the committee, and it is this: That while these pilots formed associations that were very effective in dividing up their fees, if a pilot made a mistake and grounded a vessel the owner could not go back on the association, because that was not in law an entity, and he could not sue it. His redress must be upon the pilot himself; while the owners of these tugboats were generally men of responsibility, corporations of responsibility; and if the pilot on a tugboat made a mistake there was some redress on the part of the vessel owner.

Mr. Speaker, I have already consumed more time than I expected. I reserve the balance of my time. [Loud applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MINOR], a member of the committee, who favors the minority report.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is due to the committee and to the House that they should know why I dissented from the report made on this bill. Day in and day out, sir, we listened to arguments made before the committee by sailors, by pilots, by shipowners, by merchants, by manufacturers' associations, and by all the great interests involved in the question; and these arguments, together with the limited experience I have had upon the water, lead me to the conclusion that, while there may be abuses practiced—and no doubt they are practiced by the pilots of the South—the remedy sought through this bill is entirely inadequate. It is impracticable, and not founded on good common sense or equity.

This is the first attempt, so far as I know, to license a pilot on board of a sailing vessel. Heretofore the laws have required that only steam vessels shall have licensed officers as masters, pilots, and engineers. We have established local steamboat inspectors whose duty it is to grant licenses to applicants who are qualified to receive them, but never before in the history of this country have we been called upon to empower a board to grant a pilot's license on a sailing vessel.

Now, what is the composition of the local boards in the South who examine these pilots? They are composed of business men, mostly members of boards of trade and chambers of commerce, with one practical sailor on each board. Where there is not a practical, experienced pilot on the board, the services of such men are drafted for the purpose of passing upon the qualifications of applicants for license. They dare not even trust the business men and the sailor to pass upon those questions without the opinion and judgment of a practical pilot. This bill proposes to take the matter entirely out of the hands of these pilot commissions and transfer it to the steamboat inspectors.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while the steamboat inspectors throughout the length and breadth of this land are good men, true men, and intelligent men, there is not one local inspection board in five hundred that will claim to have the information required to pass upon the qualifications of a sailing-vessel master or a pilot. Their education is in an entirely different direction. There is scarcely a rule that applies to steam vessels that will apply to sailing vessels. The sailing vessel simply floats and depends upon the elements for propulsion. The steam vessel depends upon her engine and boiler for her motive power. The requirements for the management of the two types of vessels are entirely different; and let me say right here that no sailing master, however competent, is qualified to go on board a steamboat and take charge of her, or act as a first-class pilot on her, until he has served an apprenticeship. That is the law of the United States.

Now, sir, how much time will our local inspectors have to examine pilots for sailing vessels? They are already loaded to the gunwales with work. Some of my friends and others have been compelled to lay up their steamboats—and I have had a similar experience—for want of proper inspection, because the inspectors were overburdened with work. For that reason we have been compelled to tie our steamboats up to the docks and await the action of the inspectors. There are about 12,000 of these coasting sailing vessels, every one of which will need a pilot. Now, in the name of common sense, how far will these steamboat inspectors be able to proceed with the business of passing upon the qualifications of these bar pilots, and granting licenses to them, and also doing the steamboat-inspection work which is their regular business?

This bill is impracticable in that respect. While the steamboat inspectors are not in fact qualified to do this work properly, yet even if they were qualified they have not the time to do the work, and they will not do it. Again, I ask the chairman of this committee if he believes that the local board of steamboat inspectors in Boston, or New York, or in Portland can possibly be competent to pass upon the qualifications of a bar pilot on the Southern coast, where the channels are constantly changing? The channel in most of those waters may be here to-day and elsewhere to-morrow. It may change 600 feet either way, and there may be barely room to squeeze through. Now, it is evident that no man can pass upon the qualifications of a bar pilot unless he is in and out of these channels continually. And, Mr. Speaker, this is not merely my opinion. It is based upon the highest authority in this country. I have here a communication from an eminent officer, a man who can have no possible interest in the fate of this bill or of the pilots, except in so far as it may be related to the interests of the commerce of the country. I refer to Major Mahon, of the Corps of Engineers of the Army, who is in charge of Pensacola Harbor and Navy-Yard and the improvement of rivers in Georgia, Florida, and Alabama, a man who has served for years and won his stars as one of the best authorities upon questions of this kind that can be found in the United States. I read:

Mr. Basel requested me to state to you my opinion as to whether a person who visits the harbor of Pensacola only at long intervals could expect to keep pace with and be thoroughly posted on the changes which are taking place. I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, such could not be the case. It requires a person to be constantly on the ground to follow these changes for the purpose of navigation; nor can any inspector, however conscientious he may be, pass on the capability of a navigator under such conditions of change unless the inspector be constantly engaged in following up all these changes.

I ask this House what opportunity a local inspection board in New York, or in Massachusetts, or in Maine can have of following up the changes to which Major Mahon refers and passing upon the qualifications of applicants for license as pilots? Hundreds of them have never been in those waters at all, but even if they have been there it would still be necessary that they should be in and out of these channels very frequently in order to be competent to judge of the qualifications of pilots for those waters. That was the testimony before the committee. I do not propose to drag in testimony that was smothered and brought in upon this floor without an opportunity being given to rebut it.

Mr. PAYNE. Was not that matter printed in the report of the committee weeks ago?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Not the figures you read here.

Mr. PAYNE. All of them.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. The receipts of the fund?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Only in part.

Mr. PAYNE. All of them.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin (continuing to read):

I know that it is necessary at Pensacola for the pilots to be sounding continually to keep abreast of the changes which take place, and I think it would be impracticable for a person who is not constantly on the ground, no matter how great his intelligence may be, to act as a pilot where sand bars are under consideration.

Now, I understand, Mr. Speaker (and this was the testimony before the committee), that the pilots are authorized by the Engineer in Chief of the War Department to change the buoys as the channel shifts from side to side. If you or I should do that we would be subject to a heavy fine. The engineers acknowledge the competency of these pilots, and hence give them a power that no other men on earth are allowed to exercise.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, for I am trying to understand this legislation. The purpose of this pilotage system, as I understand, is to save life or property—which?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Both.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do the sailing vessels carry passengers?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. They carry their crews.

Mr. HENDERSON. Only the crews?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then this system, in the case of sailing vessels, would be chiefly for the protection of the property?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON. And in the case of steam vessels chiefly for the protection of life?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. The sailing vessels carry crews, the numbers of which are in proportion to the size and tonnage of the vessels. The crews average from four to fifteen or twenty, according to the size of the vessel and the canvas to be handled.

A MEMBER. Do not the sailing vessels sometimes carry passengers?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. I think that as a rule they do not.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it not true, then, that the vessel owner is more largely interested than anyone else in having a pilot, if a pilot is needed for the protection of the property?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] that there is no man on earth—at least I never met one—who will not take more chances for the almighty dollar than he will for anything else; and a vessel owner, if he can save pilot fees, will take the chances of putting his vessel on a bar.

Mr. BRUMM. Is it not true that the owners of these vessels are relieved from risk by the insurance companies—that the insurance companies take the risk and the vessel owner runs no risk?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Certainly; that is correct.

Mr. STEPHENSON. Can not the vessels depend upon being towed in by the tugs?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. That depends altogether upon the condition of the weather. Just a word right there in reply to my friend from Michigan. When everything is favorable—when the weather is fine and no risks are to be taken—the tugs tow the vessels in; but I want my friend to understand—I know that he knows it—that there are often times when the tugs can not go out to tow these vessels in. The pilot boats can go out and live in weather that would drown the tugs.

Mr. HENDERSON. And the pilot boats are compelled to be there?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Yes, sir; they are compelled by the laws of the State to be there. And the purpose of this bill is to take the business away from these pilots and give it to the tugboats. So long as the weather is fair the tugboats will go out to tow the vessels in; but when the storms are heavy they will not be on hand.

Mr. STEPHENSON. When the tug takes charge of a vessel the tug master is the pilot, and the management of the vessel is at his risk. The captain of the vessel is no longer responsible. In the Chicago River a big vessel is often compelled to put on two tugs; otherwise the tug masters will not take the risk.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. There have been a number of decisions of the admiralty court on this subject. Formerly a tugboat was held responsible for every mishap that befell a vessel if the tug had a line to it. That is not the condition under more recent decisions. At present, under the rulings of the courts, unless you can prove incompetency on the part of the tug master—unless you can establish carelessness or inefficiency on his part, as the cause of the damage—the court will not hold the tug liable. All the inquiry that the courts will make is whether the tug master has shown ordinary seamanship.

Mr. STEPHENSON. If the captain of the vessel does not follow the tug he makes himself liable.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. The courts have held that when the vessel fails to follow her tug the tug is not responsible. There is no trouble with the sailing vessels; if they follow the tug they have their right of action against the tug.

Mr. STEPHENSON. And most of them have to follow the tugs.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. If the weather permits they follow the tugs. But we are not legislating for the Chicago Harbor tugs.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. How much of the coast line of the United States is affected by this bill?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. From Virginia down to Texas—nine States.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And also California and British Columbia.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. There are nine States affected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Does it affect the Pacific Coast?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. I understand not.

Mr. SIMPKINS. Does the gentleman understand that there is any compulsory pilotage on the Pacific Coast?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. I do not.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The matter is under the control of the State legislatures.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. I think there are only about eight States affected.

Mr. SIMPKINS. It does not affect the Pacific Coast at all.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Now, Mr. Speaker, very much has been said about the purpose of this compulsory pilotage bill, and I want to say, before touching on that point, that I yield to no man on the floor of this House, or anywhere else, in desire to build up our merchant marine. It is a business that I have been interested in during nearly my entire life, and no man will give more hearty support than I will to legislation proposed in its behalf if such legislation is based upon sensible lines. So far as my observation goes, every vessel that was ever chartered first considers the port charges before fixing its rates of freight——

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. Has it not been stated over and over again that the sailing vessels are in competition with the steam vessels in reference to freight charges?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARDNER. Is not the freight rate fixed by the bids made by the steam vessels, which are not subject to these port charges?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Why, my friend, let me tell you that a sailing vessel of anywhere from 500 to 1,500 tons burden can beat a steam vessel right out of the water in making low rates on freight. Every sailing vessel on the lakes, every sailing vessel on the coast of this country engaged in our commerce, can carry freight cheaper than any steamboat that ever was built, and for the very reason that the expense of running a steamer, the fuel, the men, the necessary repairs, everything that enters into the expense account, involves the necessity for an expenditure that does not exist with reference to the sailing vessel.

Mr. BRUMM. To say nothing of the first cost.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. You have in your steam vessels engines, boilers, and the necessary pipes, and you have all of these to take care of, including their repairs; you have fuel, and you have from twenty to twenty-five men on the ordinary-sized steamer. But you can run your sailing vessel at a much less expense, with a crew of only from six to twelve men.

Mr. GARDNER. The answer to the inquiry would seem to make the building of steamboats a mystery.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Well, the answer is straight to the point. These are facts that can not be disputed. There are some advantages, I suppose, on the side of the steamers. They can make quicker trips, and they can also navigate certain waters that perhaps a sailing vessel could not safely enter. But I adhere to my proposition, and I can prove it by the traffic on the lakes around Chicago and Milwaukee, and I am sure on the coast as well.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman did not include, as I understand it, the first cost of the vessel, nor also the room which is necessarily taken up by the steam boilers, the machinery, and fuel, all of which would be utilized for freight purposes on a sailing vessel.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. That is a very pertinent suggestion. A vessel that will carry fifteen hundred tons of freight will cost on the lakes, say, $25,000, at the outside, complete; while a steam vessel on the lakes that will carry the same amount of freight will cost anywhere from $75,000 to $100,000. That is the difference. And the estimate by conservative sailors, practical shipowners, and masters of vessels shows that it costs five times as much to run a steamboat as a sailing vessel.

Mr. FOOTE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. FOOTE. Is it not so that the freight carried by the steamers is really of a more perishable nature than that carried by the sailing vessel as a rule?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. That is a very proper inquiry. Now, I am going over this subject and giving only my own judgment and experience in talking of the cost. But so far as my observation goes, it is a fact that the steamboat comes in competition rather with the railroad than with the sailing vessel. Sailing vessels carry freight that steamboats do not, as a rule, carry. The steam vessel carries fruit and such freights as are required to make quick transit—perishable articles as a rule—and the sailing vessel, on the contrary, carries gross articles not of a perishable character.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Well, I did not ask you any.

Mr. PAYNE. I know. May I ask you one?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Well, yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Does not this law leave the pilotage system of Wisconsin (your State) just as it is now in regard to compulsory pilotage?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. That law was in existence probably before my time——

Mr. PAYNE. But does it not leave it just as now?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. We have no pilot system in Wisconsin.

Mr. PAYNE. Do you not have pilots there?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Why, I am a pilot.

Mr. PAYNE. Has there been any difficulty with your present system?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. The question has no relevancy whatever to this matter and is out of order.

Mr. PAYNE. I accept your answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. I think one of the most intelligent gentlemen who came before the committee during the consideration of this matter was Colonel Lamb, of Virginia, and I want to say to some of our Republican friends here that Colonel Lamb, whom I believe to be an honest and intelligent gentleman, is chairman of the Republican State central committee in Virginia. In speaking of his experience and his knowledge of these practical questions he commenced in this way: He states that he resides in Norfolk and does business there, and then he says:

I am a merchant largely engaged in shipping. I suppose I may safely say that I have more seagoing vessels consigned to my house than there are consigned to any other house south of Baltimore.

In 1884—

Now you will know by this that he is a Republican—before Mr. Cleveland's fatal policy of free raw material was to some extent carried out, Lamberts Point, which I manage as a part of my business, was a busy hive of industry. That year we shipped over 2,000,000 tons of Pocahontas coal, and bunkered nearly 500 foreign steamships sailing under the British, the Spanish, the German, and other flags, for which Virginia coal we received sterling bills equivalent to gold. Besides these, I had some 1,500 seagoing vessels. Of that amount shipped, about 1,250,000 tons of coal went to the New England States. On that we paid freight exceeding $1,000,000.

I read this, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen may know that this man has a thorough knowledge of the subject that he is discussing. He says:

I make this statement to show you that I have a personal knowledge and am largely interested in this question of pilotage, for, with all due deference to my New England friends, for whom I have the kindest regard, I think we pay the pilotage and license, and that they do not pay it.

Reading still further along, he says:

Before the present tariff prices in New England were controlled by domestic competition, we knew at what price the different factories and railroads were offered coal and we had to meet that price. We had, in order to compete, to put Pocahontas coal down there at that price in order to get the trade. Then, of course, we had to look after the freight; and, whatever my friends may say, when they fix the freight they put the pilotage on the rate. Now, since the "party-perfidy tariff" has gone into operation Queen Victoria has gone into New England, for every ton of coal that comes from Nova Scotia pays the Crown 12 cents royalty. They have fixed the price there, and we are compelled to come to it; and we still pay the pilotage.

* * * * * * *

I contend, gentlemen, that this is a State matter. We at home pay this pilotage. If it is an obstruction to trade, pray who suffers but Virginia? They say it is a tax for the privilege of sailing in Virginia waters. Oh, no! If they want to come into the harbors for refuge they can do so without paying. If they want to get our Virginia coal as freight, we say, "You can have the privilege of coming and taking this coal if you will help to keep up our Virginia pilotage system, so as to help our foreign trade."

This is but the grand doctrine, after all, of protection, and if you have navigation laws to protect sailors living in New England and the North, can not we have protection for the sailors living in Virginia?

And let me say right here that the protection given to coasting vessels is absolutely prohibitory. I am a protective-tariff man, but I never went so far as that. No vessel coming from a foreign port and going into an American port can unload a cargo and there take on a load for another American port. The law absolutely prohibits it. That is protection with a vengeance. And now they come in and want to abolish this pilot system on top of it. This gentleman further says:

Mr. Chairman, I told you a moment ago that in 1894 we paid more than $1,000,000 for coal shipped from Lamberts Point to New England. I have the figures. I think I showed the statement to the Committee on Ways and Means during the last Congress. Of that million dollars at least fifty thousand was paid because we could not employ foreign bottoms. Part of my business is chartering ships. I represent in the port of Norfolk probably 125 foreign shipowners. I charter a great many of their ships for different purposes and I know at what they can be obtained; and I tell you, sirs, without fear of contradiction, that we could have had our freight carried to New England in 1894 for $50,000 less but for our navigation laws.

There is the sum of $50,000 that went for the pilots all right, through just one institution in Norfolk.

Mr. GARDNER. There is no compulsory pilot system in New England, where this freight was shipped.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. I am speaking of the freight rate, and the pilotage being included in the freight rate, on freights taken from Southern ports to New England.

Mr. GARDNER. But the freight was shipped to New England, where there is no compulsory pilotage system.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. But they had to pay it down in Virginia. You have got hold of the wrong end of the string, my friend. That is all that ails you. The State of Virginia has a compulsory pilotage law, and every vessel going to the State of Virginia for coal has to pay a pilot, that is all.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman states, does he not, that he would have shipped his coal $50,000 cheaper if it had not been for that system?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. No, sir; the gentleman states that if he had been allowed to ship in foreign bottoms this freight could have been shipped for $50,000 less than our American coastwise vessels would take it for. That is what he said, and I say that a part of that $50,000, at least, went to pay these pilot fees. Now, I want you gentlemen to listen to this. It is good doctrine. Continuing, Colonel Lamb says:

Now, I am not opposed to the navigation laws, and we cheerfully pay that amount for the protection which it gives to the American sailor. And why? That same grand policy of protection has ribbed this country with railroads; it has put steamers on every stream, and it has built factories all over our land, and those factories, those steamers, and those railroads help to consume our coal. I say I-am not opposed to the protection granted by those navigation laws which prevent me from shipping coal from Lamberts Point in foreign bottoms.

He is not opposed to it, and would rather pay his just proportion of the pilot fees.

Now, gentlemen, there has been something said about the property of the pilots. Everyone knows, I suppose, that they are obliged to have an outfit, boots and rubber coats and the necessary paraphernalia, to enable them to go out in all kinds of weather, because the laws that create this system are so stringent that every pilot who fails to respond when on duty, or who is absent from the bar for a continuous forty-eight hours is in danger of having his license revoked and of being relegated to private life. No matter what the weather is, or the danger to be encountered, he must be there.

Mr. SIMPKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman if some of these Florida pilots have not been absent from the bar for more than forty-eight hours and present in this city of Washington for nearly forty-eight days?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. I will answer the gentleman by saying that I believe that to be the fact, and I know that the laws of Virginia and Florida compel them to be there, or else they forfeit certain rights. I know that a statute of the United States requires you to be here. How much have you been absent? [Great laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. I hope gentlemen will not bother me much longer with questions.

Mr. TALBERT. Is it not a fact that those States spoken of are the best judges of what the fees of the pilots should be, and would not this deprive them of the right to determine that matter?

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. In answer to that question I will simply say this, that in the State of Florida, although the general law fixes the maximum rate for which the services may be rendered, there are seven ports, not one of which agrees with another. They change their rules according to the local conditions of the port. That being the case, and that being the legislation enacted by men who are interested in the matter, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how can this Congress regulate the pilotage and make everything fair and equitable in nine whole and different States?

Mr. TALBERT. They are the best judges of their own business.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. That is the point exactly. They ought to be, and I believe are, competent to judge of their own local wants.

Mr. TALBERT. That is the idea I wanted to get out.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. In the committee, in considering this bill, I suggested an amendment as to the time of its going into effect. I saw that it was vicious. I know that every dollar that these men accumulate goes into boats and paraphernalia to fulfill the functions of their business and to perform their duties satisfactorily to the marine interests, and I know they own these boats. I proposed in this bill to give them at least one year before it went into operation, to give them an opportunity to dispose of their property. But no, sir; the majority of the committee could not see it as I did, and, as intelligent a leader as he is in the House, the chairman of the committee could not see it. He has had no practical knowledge. I know that a pilot boat is good for little else except as a pilot boat. They can not be used as freighters, they can not be used as yachts, nor as fruit boats, to any advantage. They are built expressly for pilot boats. I want these men down there, who have been frugal and industrious, and who have saved a few dollars, to be able to dispose of that property at the highest market rate, and they can not do it under this bill, for there is not the time allowance.

Now, a great deal has been said about paying the pilot whether you use him or not. I want to say to the chairman of the committee that I assume he is a taxpayer. I assume that he is a man of good character. I want to say to him that every day of his life he is paying to maintain jails, and yet I know he is a moral man and one of whom I would say that he was never in a jail in his life except as a visitor. [Laughter.] I want to say to him he is supporting a fire department, if he lives in a city, for the preservation of his property, and yet he may never have had property destroyed by a fire. But he is taxed just the same. I want to say to this House that we print statutes at the expense of the United States, but we have not a surfeit of good lawyers. There are many of them that we could dispense with, but they are not the good ones.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that one of the most sacred pledges that was ever given by the Republican party is the pledge given to the honest laboring men in these United States; and I say to you that if this bill passes it will seriously cripple the labor of these ports, especially in this branch. That is admitted on all hands. I have been flooded both in committee and out of committee with resolutions adopted by commercial organizations, by Grand Army posts, by engineers' beneficial associations, by steamboat captains, by shippers and merchants, and everyone who has a practical knowledge of this subject to do my utmost to defeat this bill. It has been asserted here that the occupation of pilot is handed down from father to son as a sort of heirloom. I say that is untrue. A gentleman who was before our committee went from New York only a few years ago, served an apprenticeship of four years, was licensed as a bar pilot, and is to-day president of the pilots' association of Florida; and he is the son of a brave and gallant Union officer during the war of the rebellion.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to take up very much more time on this matter. I just want to say this that I respect the Republican party to-day above all other political organizations on earth, not for the promises it has made, but for the pledges it has kept, and for its faithfulness to the people of the country. It is one of the cardinal principles of our party to promote and elevate the labor of this country; but if you pass this bill you are treading on tender ground. It should be your duty to make the humble homes of the pilots as respectable and as happy as possible; to keep the fires burning brightly; to give as much sunshine as possible and disperse the cloud of despair; for I say to you that around the hearthstones of these hardy pilots there is plenty of pure patriotism and loyalty to this country. Maintain it, and encourage your humble working people in pure and intelligent citizenship, and give them opportunities to live and thrive, and your Government is safe and enduring. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SIMPKINS. Mr. Speaker, before continuing the argument so well and ably begun and carried through by the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries [Mr. PAYNE], I wish to reply to the last gentleman who spoke [Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin], answering his personal remark in reply to my question concerning his statement that the pilots are required to be constantly on duty or else lose their positions. When he made this assertion I called the gentleman's attention to the fact that the pilots of Florida, representatives of the pilots' association, seemed to have an abundance of time and to be free from duty to come here to Washington to lobby in season and out of season against this bill; and he replied by asking me how much I had been absent.

Now, although I was willing to join in the laugh which that response excited, I do not concede that the gentleman's answer was an adequate and convincing argument; but since he has called attention to that particular point, I wish to say that I have been present so constantly at every hearing of the committee, and so constantly in the House, that if the law of which he spoke as applying to pilots in Florida had been applied to me I would not have lost pay or place by reason of absence. [Applause.]

Now, however, Mr. Speaker, let us take up the bill. What is the proposition which we are considering? Let us take it up in a business way, for it is purely a business proposition, and ascertain exactly how we are steering, in order that we may cross the bar of this difficulty with or without a pilot. In the first place, there are two classes of American vessels engaged in our commerce. The first class is composed of vessels engaged in the foreign trade, vessels sailing to England, to Germany, to China, to India, or to some other foreign land. All these vessels are compelled to pay pilotage, and this bill does not affect them in any way. The second class is made up of vessels engaged in our coastwise trade. The vessels engaged in that trade are of two classes, steam vessels and sailing vessels, and the gentleman who last spoke is himself a representative of steam vessels. His vessels are not affected in any way by this bill. It will thus be seen that this bill proposes to do one thing. It proposes to put sailing vessels on an equality with steam vessels in this matter of pilotage. Both are engaged in the same business. They carry on the same business in the same waters. The sailing vessel comes in competition with the steam vessel. The sailing vessel is obliged to pay compulsory pilotage whether she takes the services of a pilot or not, while the steam vessel is allowed to exercise its option. The steam vessel is not required to pay pilotage unless it accepts the services of a pilot.

Now, I wish to call the attention of gentlemen of the opposition to this point: Under this bill, if it becomes a law, if a sailing vessel takes a pilot she pays pilotage; if she does not take a pilot she is no longer obliged to pay compulsory pilotage. Let me say to the pilots of the Southern States that in opposing the passage of this bill they are being for a time—for only a very short time—penny wise, but that, in the long run, they are being decidedly pound foolish. How can this be?

Mr. Speaker, in spite of the arguments of gentlemen here, everyone knows that the steam vessel is rapidly driving the sailing vessel from the sea; and if you drive the sailing vessels out you reduce the number of chances to render pilot service. The total number of American sailing vessels has already declined from 28,000 in 1874 to 17,000 at the present time. We know that there were only some 600 sailing vessels flying the American flag engaged in foreign voyages last year. We know that to-day over 2,000 steam vessels of over 50 tons are engaged in the coasting trade in competition with the American sailing ships that are left, larger in number, it is true, but smaller in tonnage and dwindling day by day. If those vessels are compelled to bear the burden of paying pilotage, they will be rendered less able to keep up the contest which they have to engage in to hold the sea against their steam competitors.

Mr. Speaker, let us briefly consider what these pilot laws are in several of the States. Let me direct your attention to some of the ports where pilots are needed and to some of those that may be safely navigated without the services of a pilot.

In the first place, then, take the State of Virginia. In that State vessels engaged in the coasting trade are obliged to pay for the services of a pilot whether they require those services or not, unless the owner of the vessel is willing to pay a tonnage tax of 10 cents per ton. In connection with that law of the State of Virginia, let me call the attention of the House to that clause of the Constitution which provides that—

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty on tonnage.

In spite of that provision of the Constitution certain States have taken advantage of the authority given by Congress to the States to impose pilotage fees, and now impose a tonnage tax, saying to the vessel owner: "Unless you pay a tonnage tax you must take a pilot; but if you buy a license by the payment of this tonnage tax your vessel will be perfectly safe and you will have no need of the services of a pilot."

How is it in South Carolina? The laws of that State exempt vessels sailing from ports within the State from pilotage charges, and in doing so they come in direct conflict with that clause of the Constitution, or at least with the spirit of that clause of the Constitution, which says that—

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another.

That provision of the law of South Carolina is also in direct antagonism to the act of Congress, which provides that—

No regulations or provisions shall be adopted by any State which shall make any discrimination in the rate of pilotage or half pilotage between vessels sailing between the ports of one State and vessels sailing between the ports of different States.

Under the general authority granted by Congress in 1789, several Southern States have passed laws which are in direct conflict with at least the spirit of these two clauses of the Constitution that I have cited, and also in violation of the act of Congress I have referred to.

Take Alabama. That State discriminates in its laws in this way: It allows vessels sailing between Pensacola and New Orleans to enter the port of Mobile without the payment of a fee, but says to a vessel from Texas, or Maine, or Massachusetts, or New York, or any other State: "If you come into the port of Mobile carrying exactly the same cargo as this vessel from New Orleans or Pensacola brings to this port, you must pay compulsory pilotage whether you agree to accept the services of a pilot or not." Thus the laws of the Southern States vary in many particulars; but they all agree in providing that pilotage shall be levied whether the services of the pilot are accepted or not. Mr. Speaker, where else is any such principle adopted? Where else is there such a discrimination against one class and in favor of another?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Will the gentleman permit me to answer that question?

Mr. SIMPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Great Britain authorizes compulsory pilotage, the rates of which vary at different ports; and, so far as I know, the same is true of every commercial nation in the world.

Mr. GARDNER. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the different conditions in those countries as to the ebb and flow of the tides?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I did not catch the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. GARDNER. My suggestion was simply this: At Liverpool, for instance, you have an ebb and flow of the tide to the extent of 32 feet; so that there are entirely different conditions from those which exist here.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. And on account of those varying conditions the local pilotage rates vary; in some parts of the British coast pilotage is compulsory, and in others it is not.

Mr. SIMPKINS. I am delighted to meet the suggestion of the gentleman from Florida. He tries to compare the conditions existing in Great Britain with those existing here in the United States. I have pointed out that the laws of the different States on this subject are in violation of clauses of the Constitution, and in reply the gentleman says that England has compulsory pilotage, varying in rates at the different ports. Now, let me call attention to the laws of England on this subject. I have here a book entitled Dock and Port Charges of the United Kingdom. There are in the United Kingdom some ports owned by individuals, some owned by corporations. Nothing of that sort exists in this country. Turning to page 176 of this book I find the dock charges at one port in the Kingdom of Great Britain, Dundrum Bay, a subport of Newry, in latitude 54° 13′ N., longitude 5° 50′. It is the property of the Marquis of Downshire—his sole property. He has recently made considerable improvements——

Mr. BRUMM. The book to which the gentleman refers gives dock charges, not pilotage rates.

Mr. SIMPKINS. And this other volume relates to pilotage.

We thus see that the ports in Great Britain are in some instances owned by individuals and in other instances—for example, in Folkestone—the port is under control of the corporation. It is the property of the Southeastern Railroad Company. There are no pilots, but boatmen charge only from 15 to 30 shillings per vessel, according to size. These individuals or corporations have the power under the law to regulate their dock charges, and pilotage is very light. Turning to the pilotage charges, we find on page 371 of the merchant shipping act of 1894 this provision:

> There shall be no compulsory pilotage, and no restriction on the power of duly qualified persons to obtain licenses as pilots in any new pilotage district constituted under this section or in an area included in a pilotage district under this section.

If I had time to go through the different laws of England at length we would find a great many variations in the law, as the gentleman from Florida has said; but we would find in every instance some specific reason for the discrimination where it exists. But in no one place—this is the point I wish to make—either in England or in any other country, do we find the nation making a discrimination between the two classes of vessels engaged in the same waters and the same trade, such as is made in this country between sailing vessels and steam vessels entering Southern ports to-day.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Is there anything in this bill to regulate or prevent discrimination? In Florida there are no discriminations. Why, then, bring in a sweeping bill which, in our opinion, virtually destroys the local pilotage system instead of correcting the abuses of the existing system, if there are any?

Mr. SIMPKINS. The gentleman says there are no discriminations in Florida. But there are. They exempt a certain class of vessels drawing less than 6 feet of water. They also make a discrimination between vessels that carry the United States mails and those that do not. Vessels carrying the United States mails (if I have read the pilotage laws of Florida correctly) pay only one-half pilotage. If you go to a foreign city you may have to pay taxes for things that you do not care for and do not receive. In the fashionable resorts in Germany or in Switzerland you will have to pay a band tax and other local taxes, although you may get no benefit from them. That is the foreign system, although it does not prevail in England. You have to pay these taxes if you wish to visit those places. Here in America the principle has been, and I hope it will continue—this compulsory pilotage law is the only variation from it that I know anything of—that those who enjoy a benefit shall pay for it. Nowhere else do we have taxation without return.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me call attention to the condition of our harbors as it was when Congress passed the law which gave the States charge of this pilotage system. That was in the last century. Our bays, our rivers, our harbors were then as God made them—in a state of nature. Since that time this Government has spent over $81,000,000 in improving those waterways, simply for the purpose of assisting the navigator, of giving aid to commerce. In Galveston over $7,000,000 have been spent for the improvement of that harbor. At Pensacola $100,000 is appropriated in the bill of this year, and many millions of dollars have been spent at New Orleans and other Southern ports; and let me call your attention to the fact that it was Senator HOAR of Massachusetts who first and foremost originated that work and urged it. He knew no State lines, and did not discriminate as between the North and South, but he saw that great work could be done, and went voluntarily forward to champion the cause of the improvement of these Southern ports and voted willingly for the appropriation of sums larger than any amount that was ever spent for the harbors in Massachusetts.

Now, it seems to me that after the Government has done this great work in every harbor that can float a merchant vessel we should not continue this system against our commerce unless the other side shows very good reasons why a few pilots who may have their salaries or yearly stipends cut down a trifle by this legislation should be privileged and considered to the exclusion of everybody else.

The gentleman from Florida asks me, why not bring in a bill to accomplish this in some other way? I know of no other way in which it can be accomplished. Gentlemen seem to apprehend that the pilot system will be injured if this is carried into execution. I do not think the pilotage system will be injured in the South. I wish to direct your attention to the fact that we had the compulsory pilotage system in Massachusetts, New Jersey, Connecticut, and New York, and that the compulsory pilotage system was abolished years ago, and when it was abolished at the North the very same arguments were used that are now used.

Gentlemen appeared before our State legislatures and said, "Why, if you abolish this compulsory pilotage system not only will the pilot system be destroyed, but you can not get into the ports of Fall River or New Bedford or across the shoals at Nantucket with safety." But it was done away with, and since then not a word has been said or a voice raised to ask that it be resumed; and nowhere either in the Southland nor in the Northland will you find a better system of pilotage, or braver and bolder men, or men who will go farther out to the sea, taking all the risks of that dangerous calling, than the pilots who go out from the ports of Boston and New York. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to pay that tribute to the bravery of men who go away out to the Banks and to the Georges, far out to sea on our dangerous northern coast. They go out bravely in search of vessels and pilot them in safety into port.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Does not the gentleman know that these pilots of whom he speaks are opposed to this bill?

Mr. SIMPKINS. I know that the gentleman [Mr. CUMMINGS] who represents the pilots is opposed to it. I also know that one of the members of the New York Pilotage Association has been before our committee, and I understand that he is employed by the pilot association of the South to oppose the bill. But I can not see how the pilots——

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will correct the gentleman right there, if he will allow me. He is employed by the New York and Sandy Hook pilots, and is a competent pilot who has had over forty years of service himself.

Mr. SIMPKINS. I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that I could not see what interest the pilots of Boston and New York can have in opposing the bill. It does not affect the ports of Boston and New York or any other ports until you come to the ports of Virginia, unless it be that they simply have a kind of sympathy for the pilots of the South because they are engaged in the same business.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will answer that right there. They desire that the pilots of the South shall have the same privilege as the pilots of the North.

Mr. SIMPKINS. They will have exactly the same privilege when this bill is passed; exactly the same. To-day the pilots of the South have greater privileges. To-day the pilots of the South under the law receive pilotage fees for no services performed. The pilots of the North, on the contrary, receive pay for the performance of services which are actually and well performed. We are only asking in this bill that you will have the same equality for them; that you shall not discriminate between the two classes of service, or between the vessel owners engaged in commerce on our coast. The vessel owners are perfectly willing to pay for the pilot if they use the services of one. But they do insist that they ought not to be obliged to pay a tax without any return whatever.

Mr. TYLER. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. SIMPKINS. Yes.

Mr. TYLER. Is it not true that at one time the compulsory pilotage system extended throughout the Northern States, and was done away with by the action of the State legislatures themselves when they saw fit to do so? Is it not true that New York had the compulsory system, and that it was done away with by the action of the State legislature of New York because they believed it would not interfere with the efficiency of the system?

Mr. SIMPKINS. Well, I will say——

Mr. TYLER. And one moment more, with the gentleman's consent. The other question is, Is it not still a fact that the system in the Northern States is maintained by taxation levied upon foreign vessels?

Mr. SIMPKINS. Well, I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that my remarks have had the effect of rousing the gentleman, who wishes to make me go over again what I have been endeavoring to say all along in my own feeble manner.

Mr. TYLER. I was not present during the first part of the gentleman's speech.

Mr. SIMPKINS. It is a fact that the system is kept up by the pilotage fees collected from foreign vessels. It is a fact that in the North we had the compulsory system at one time, and it was abolished in the face of the opposition of the pilots themselves; and no one now desires to return to that old system.

Mr. TYLER. By State legislature?

Mr. SIMPKINS. By State legislature.

Mr. BRUMM. Why do you not let State legislatures do the same in the South? Why do you interfere with them?

Mr. SIMPKINS. If the pilots' associations have so much power politically before Congress, how much more power do they have before the legislatures of their own States? They can block there legislation which would be good for the nation and good for the country. The vessel owners have been obliged to come to Congress for relief. This is not the first time they have been here. They have been here during the past twenty years, and I wish to cite this in evidence of the fact that nothing will be settled finally until it is settled right.

But in spite of their many attempts, this is the first time that this bill has been discussed in this Congress or in any Congress, although it has been here year after year. A favorable report was made a few years ago, but it was killed on the question of consideration. So this question never has been debated before in the American Congress, and that is the only reason, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, why this bill was not passed long ago.

I wish now to bring forward a few facts and figures obtained from the collectors of Southern ports showing to what extent vessels engaged in the coastwise carrying trade employ tugs in entering Southern harbors. Telegrams from the collectors of these ports show the following facts: The collector at Pensacola states that 25 per cent of the vessels coming in there use tugs; in Wilmington 50 per cent of the vessels employ tugs; in Charleston 85 per cent use tugs; in Mobile 90 per cent employ the services of tugs; at Brunswick, Ga., 50 per cent entering and 90 per cent leaving use tugs; in Savannah 85 per cent of the vessels employ the services of tugs; in Norfolk 95 per cent, in Fernandino 95 per cent, and in Shieldsboro 95 per cent. So you see, Mr. Speaker, that in addition to being compelled to use the services of a pilot——

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. SIMPKINS. In one minute. In addition to being obliged to employ a pilot and pay him whether they need his services or not, they also, for convenience and quickness and safety, employ the services of tugs.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not in clear and good weather that they use these tugs, and when it is stormy and unpleasant weather if they are not compelled to use pilots, and can not get along without them?

Mr. SIMPKINS. I have just stated, Mr. Speaker, that from 25 to 95 per cent of the vessels entering these harbors use tugs. Now, I do not know whether it is because there is clear weather during that percentage of the time or not. In the case of the vessels which, for example, enter the harbor of Norfolk——

Mr. TALBERT. My question is whether they use tugs in fine, clear weather and pilots in bad weather?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is trying to answer that question.

Mr. SIMPKINS. In Norfolk 95 per cent of the vessels employ tugs. Now, it is possible that 95 per cent of the vessels come in during clear weather, and that only 5 per cent come in during stormy weather. I hope they always have such smiling skies in the South.

Mr. TALBERT. Statistics are very deceiving. I wished to know what the facts are.

Mr. SIMPKINS. If they have that much clear weather down there, I do not see that these pilots have to endure much of the hardship in the performance of their duties upon which so much stress has been laid.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Are these figures anything more than guesses?

Mr. SIMPKINS. I stated that these figures are the replies from the collectors of these ports. They are the best judgment of these collectors, and the telegrams stated that the information was the best information that could be received from the ports where these vessels entered.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. They keep no official record, do they?

Mr. SIMPKINS. This Government does not provide that official records should be kept; so how can there be any official records? The gentleman is well aware that it is impossible to obtain an official record. The gentleman is also well aware, Mr. Speaker, that it is impossible to obtain official records of the amount of money that the pilots receive. They have charge of their own books.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. And it is impossible to obtain an official record of the moneys that the owners of sailing vessels receive for freight.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman admits that his statistics are not reliable.

Mr. STEELE. They come from Democratic sources—Democratic collectors?

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman is simply giving us his own conclusions.

Mr. SIMPKINS. These figures that I have presented are the opinions of the collectors of Southern ports, the best opinions of these Democratic officials; and gentlemen from the Southland may take them for what they are worth. I do not admit they are not reliable. I think they are reliable.

Mr. TYLER. Does the gentleman take the position that a tugboat does away with the necessity for a pilot or takes the place of one?

Mr. SIMPKINS. Why, I leave that to the gentleman himself. If he is the owner of a schooner engaged in the coasting trade, and if he gets his vessel down off the bar of one of these ports and employs the services of a tug, which is obliged to have on board a licensed, skillful pilot, and his vessel is at one end of a hawser, with a tug towing him into harbor, I leave it to his own judgment whether he thinks, in addition to that, he needs a pilot or not. But I will also say that it was in evidence before our committee that in a case where the pilot was taken on board when these tugs had hold of the vessel the pilot thought his services were so little needed that he went below and slept in a hammock during the whole trip.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. The gentleman says he would leave it to our judgment. Now, I would like for the gentleman——

Mr. SIMPKINS. I suggest that the gentleman can occupy his own time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. SIMPKINS. I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to answer any question that may be asked; but the chairman of the committee points out to me that to yield further would be to consume time that other gentlemen desire to occupy.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Then the gentleman does not leave it to our judgment.

Mr. PAYNE. I submit to the gentleman that he can make his own statement. He will have plenty of time.

Mr. SIMPKINS. I wish to call the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, to a few figures showing what proportion the pilotage fees bears to the whole net freight and to the gross freight of a voyage. These are figures from owners' books. They will show gentlemen very well what the gross freight of a coasting schooner is, just how much she receives for freight, and what she has to pay out for pilotage charges. For example, here is a schooner of 519 tons. She makes a voyage from Providence to Newport News, Key West, Port Tampa, and back to Providence. Her gross freight is $4,348. (No insurance, no depreciation charges enter into this computation.) Her net freight is $846. Her pilotage charges were: Newport News, $51.90; Key West, $104.50; Port Tampa, $7.65; New Orleans, $140; a total of $364.40 paid for pilotage. That is 43 per cent of the net freight of the vessel.

Mr. LESTER. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. SIMPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. LESTER. Did that vessel that you speak of make all these ports in one voyage?

Mr. SIMPKINS. She made all of these ports in one voyage.

Mr. LESTER. She went first from Providence?

Mr. SIMPKINS. She went first from Providence to Newport News, then to Key West, Port Tampa, New Orleans, and back to Providence; and in that one trip she paid $365 for pilotage charges.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. What is the gross freight?

Mr. SIMPKINS. Her gross freight was $4,348 and her net freight $846.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. How do you make that enormous difference?

Mr. SIMPKINS. I will say right here that pilotage charges, as a rule, amount to one-third of the net freight.

Mr. FOOTE. What is the net freight made of? What is taken out of the gross freight to make that?

Mr. SIMPKINS. No insurance is charged, but I suppose it would be the expenses, the pay of the crews, etc.; but I do not know all the items that go to make up the charge.

Mr. FOOTE. Interest on the investment, I suppose?

Mr. SIMPKINS. No; interest on the investment is not charged.

Mr. BRUMM. It was the net profits.

Mr. FOOTE. If the gentleman will allow me, although I do not desire to interrupt him, it robs the figures of all their significance if we do not know what comes out of the gross freight.

Mr. SIMPKINS. I will give you the case of a schooner of 515 tons, from Boston to Savannah Light. The gross freight was $1,831. There was no insurance and no depreciation charged, and the net freight was $458. The pilotage charges at Savannah were $125. That is to say, the pilotage charges amounted to 27 per cent of the net freight.

Mr. FOOTE. Will the gentleman allow me? I do not see how you can tell what the net freight is until you get the charges that come out of the gross freight.

Mr. SIMPKINS. I do not know what they are. The gentleman can look at the figures, if he desires to. The figures will show what a large proportion is paid as fees for pilots, even if their services are received. In other words, Mr. Speaker, all the people engaged in carrying on this coastwise trade, and there are hundreds of them indirectly and directly engaged in it, have to pay this pilotage. Those who are interested in one of these vessels are the people who own the vessel, the people who ship freight in her, the sailors who receive their wages, all of which can only be in proportion to what the vessel receives. All of these people are engaged in carrying on this trade, and yet the pilot, who only takes her over the bar, receives in compensation for his services, or receives whether he gives service or not, one-third of the return. The steam vessel does not have to pay these charges, and the sailing vessel is in direct competition with the steam vessel.

Mr. BRUMM. When you say they receive one-third of the return, you do not mean to say that the net return is made up before the pilotage is deducted, do you?

Mr. SIMPKINS. I mean to say this, Mr. Speaker, that the vessel making this trip that I have spoken of, while her gross freight was $1,183, her net freight was $458, and while there was no insurance charges, she had to pay for pilotage the sum of $125.47, which is 27 per cent of the net freight. These are the figures of the owner, taken from his own books, kept in the usual business way, and gentlemen can see just exactly what they mean.

Mr. BRUMM. He does not take out the freight. The net freight is the balance after the pilotage is paid.

Mr. FOOTE. I desire to ask the gentleman if he will permit me to ask him a couple of questions?

Mr. SIMPKINS. There are other figures here, Mr. Speaker. These examples can be multiplied indefinitely. The gentleman who furnished me this statement, Mr. Freeman, says of them himself that they can be multiplied indefinitely, that they are actual accounts, "and can be verified from his own books."

Mr. FOOTE. If the gentleman could tell us the length of the voyages and the value of the ship it would give us some idea of the profits in a year.

Mr. SIMPKINS. If the gentleman from New York is not in favor of the great principle that a man should not pay for something that he does not receive; if he does not believe that we should not discriminate against sailing vessels and in favor of steam vessels, then, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, no amount of figures that I could bring to him as to the amounts paid for pilotage and to sailing masters would convince him and induce him to give his vote to this bill. I need only say that in the gross amount this is a great burden for the American sailing vessels to bear, and I say that nowhere else in the United States is this system of tribute levied.

I say that it is un-American, un-Republican, and un-Democratic. It does not belong to any system in this country. In their minority report the gentlemen in opposition say that compulsory pilotage is as old as commerce. They speak of the Hanseatic league, which, as you all know, was a league of northern German towns for the benefit of themselves to give them a monopoly of commerce. They say that compulsory pilotage is found away back beyond the Christian era and from that time down to the present. We grant it. We say that we have compulsory pilotage to-day, and that we will have compulsory pilotage after this bill is passed; but it will be pilotage levied equally, levied without unjust and unfair discrimination, levied fairly and honestly. If they wish to make comparisons with the laws of former times they had better make it between the system in vogue to-day in the Southland and the system that was in vogue along the coast of the Mediterranean when American and English vessels had to pay tribute to the Barbary States and along the coast of Algiers—a system of tribute that was so abhorrent to the American people that away back in 1803–1805 they sent an American fleet and forced a treaty upon those people and compelled them to cease levying tribute upon the commerce of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, in my nine years in Congress this bill has appeared periodically and surreptitiously. Sometimes it has sought a resting place in the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and again it has been popped into the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It was favorably reported in the Fifty-first Congress and defeated on the question of consideration. In other Congresses it has hibernated in committee. It is a bill drawn in the interest of shipowners at the expense of pilots. The shipowners are already drawing largely on the bounty of the Federal Government. Not a foreign vessel is allowed to engage in our coastwise trade. All of this trade, therefore, is practically in the hands of the shipowners of New England. Call it protection, if you please. I say these shipowners are already sufficiently protected. They pay no tonnage dues. They pay no light-house dues. They do not even pay entrance and clearance fees in the United States custom-houses. This last, small as it may seem, is a gratuity to them from this Government, amounting to between seven and eight million dollars a year. And yet they appear here and demand further Federal favor at the expense of the pilots.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the most important duty devolving upon Congress is that of legislation. It carries with it grave responsibilities and graver consequences. We are to legislate for the whole people, not for the few. Above all, we should not favor one trade or profession at the expense of another. The rich should not be privileged at the expense of the poor. Life and property should not be imperiled unless the safety of the nation is endangered. I have said that the shipowners are already sufficiently protected. Practically the Government has built a Chinese wall around them. No competition is allowed. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SIMPKINS] said that coastwise vessels were entitled to the same privileges that steam vessels engaged in coastwise trade enjoy, but he did not tell you how coastwise steamers secured these privileges. The robbery of the pilots has been crafty and persistent. The steamship slice was put as a rider upon an appropriation bill and sneaked through Congress. The same cunning hand is at work upon this bill. Here is Senate bill 2162, entitled "A bill to amend certain sections of Title LII of the Revised Statutes relating to steam vessels and to codify therein all existing amendments relating to the same enacted by Congress since the close of the Forty-fourth Congress"—truly an innocent title. On page 25, however, I find this pilotage bill which we are considering snugly hidden away, ready to be run through the House under cover the same as the bill exempting steam vessels was run through years ago. And for aught I know, it may turn up in some other secret nook or corner of the Capitol before this Congress adjourns.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us compare the protection—call it protection, if you please—given to the shipowners with the protection given to the pilots. The Government has done nothing whatever for the pilots. It has simply left them to the care of the States. The State legislatures enact laws for them and prescribe their fees and duties.

Before our Constitution was formed pilotage was regulated by each separate colony. England did not interfere. After the Union was formed and the Constitution was adopted Congress continued the jurisdiction to the different States. Each colony had controlled it and each State was left in control of its pilots. It was thought that certainly no State would adopt any measure that would injure its own commerce; on the contrary, each State would secure all the commercial advantages possible by legislative action. The New England States then had compulsory pilotage. New York had it, and so had the Southern States.

The law authorizes each State to regulate its own pilotage dues and to fix them for its own ports. "Compulsory pilotage," as gentlemen call it, was then the general rule. It lasted in each of the original States just as long as it was to the interest of each State to maintain it, and no longer. It has been repealed in some of the seaboard States and it exists in others. The States in which it has been repealed are the States in which most of the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade have been built and are owned. It was to their own interest to abolish compulsory pilotage in their own States. Their ports were frequented by their own vessels.

Their ships traded with the South, but no Southern-built or Southern-owned ships entered their ports. It was to their interest to repeal the law, and it is to their interest to invalidate it in all the other States, if possible. They ought to seek its invalidation, if at all, at the hands of the State legislatures; but they prefer to level the heads of all the pilots at one fell swoop by deftly using the sword of Federal legislation.

The manly way would have been to seek the repeal through the legislatures of the States interested, but they prefer another road. Having received the full benefit of the law in their own States, they now appear before Congress and ask you to deprive citizens of other States of the very privileges that they themselves have enjoyed to their heart's content. Their own action was voluntary. They kept the laws upon their own statute books while they served their own interests, and repealed them when their own interests required.

They are not willing to allow their sister States to do the same. Their action, however, proves that each State is alive to its own commercial interests and may be safely trusted to care for them. And this is precisely why Congress left the matter to the legislatures of the different States. They would assuredly try to foster and not to injure their own commerce. They would endeavor to increase and not to decrease it. They were the most competent to deal with the question. They certainly knew what was best for their own commercial interests and for the interests of commerce at large. No State will maintain compulsory pilotage longer than it is necessary for the safety of life and property. It is this very safety that insures the increase of its commerce. When life and property are safe without it, its retention must injure its commerce, and its legislature is sure to act.

To illustrate this: After over fifty years of compulsory pilotage, the State of New York, in 1845, repealed all its pilotage laws. For eight years any person could lawfully act as a pilot if desirous of doing so. A captain could take a pilot or not take one, just as he pleased. The pilots made regulations to suit themselves, and were held to no accountability for neglect of duty. Captain and pilot each took advantage of the other as the exigencies of the situation admitted. So things went along until 1853.

Now, mark the sequel. In that year the ship New Era appeared off the New Jersey coast with a load of immigrants from Antwerp. Its captain was hailed by a pilot, but refused to take one. He declared that, even if it did take him until next day, he was fully capable of piloting his own ship into the harbor. That night a tempest arose. Before daylight the ship was a total wreck. Hundreds of lives were lost. Four hundred and eight bodies drifted ashore and were buried in a huge grave on the site of what is now Asbury Park.

This disaster appalled the country. All classes were aroused. The merchants of New York were stirred to the very core. Moses H. Grinnell, Charles H. Marshall, John I. Boyd, E. K. Collins, David Ogden, the Howlands and Aspinwalls, George and Nathaniel Griswold, and others whose names have been woven into the commercial prosperity of New York City, petitioned the legislature for the reenactment of the compulsory pilotage law. [Applause.]

The legislature heeded the appeal. The law was reenacted. For seventeen years it remained upon the statute books. The State enforced the law until she had enough foreign trads to support her pilots without it. Then she repealed it so far as it applied to coastwise vessels and Sandy Hook pilots. It was continued at Hell Gate until General Newton's operations had made the navigation of that channel comparatively safe. After Newton's work the Hell Gate pilots began to exact tribute from coasting vessels under the compulsory law. The vessel owners complained to the State legislature and not to Congress, and the legislature again repealed the law as to coastwise vessels. It is not now on the statute books of New York, because it is not needed. The pilot service can be maintained without it. The compulsory fees from vessels engaged in the foreign trade keep it efficient.

If you are going to repeal here the fees as to coastwise vessels, why not repeal all pilotage laws? Why not let all vessels, foreign as well as American, come in free? You call the pilotage system "robbery." Why rob foreigners? If you let the coastwise vessels come in free, why not allow foreign vessels the same privilege and open up your coastwise trade to them? Their captains and vessel owners would gladly pay pilotage fees if allowed the same privileges as these domestic coastwise craft.

Seven of the original thirteen States have reaped all the advantages of the act passed by the First Congress giving them control over the pilotage on their own coasts. Why should the others be debarred from the same right? What have the States which have entered the Union since the adjournment of the First Congress done that they should be robbed of this right, acquired when they entered the sisterhood of States? Are Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island entitled to any more privileges than Maryland, Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia? Why rob the Gulf States of the privileges acquired when they entered the Union? Why rob the Pacific Coast of its rights in this matter? My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SIMPKINS] says there is no compulsory pilotage there. I do not know whether there is or not; but the legislatures of California, Oregon, and Washington ought to have the privilege of placing compulsory pilotage on vessels entering their ports if the safety of life and commerce requires it. New York had this privilege, Massachusetts had it, and certainly the other States of the Union ought to have the same.

Above all, why deny to New York the right to again reenact the law if another New Era shipwreck should occur and she deems it necessary for the protection of life and property? She has proved that she can safely be trusted to legislate upon this matter for herself. And so can all the other coastwise States. In time, if left alone, they will undoubtedly follow in the footsteps of New York and of the New England States and repeal the law; but it will not be done until they have developed enough foreign commerce to sustain the pilots necessary to insure the safety of vessels and of human life.

To abandon this system south of New York would destroy the excellent pilotage system which now exists there. There are not enough foreign vessels arriving and departing to make it pay. But, sir, if you repeal the compulsory pilotage laws as applied to all coastwise sailing vessels, why not repeal all other State laws concerning pilotage? Why not wipe out the whole system? If it is wrong in one State it is wrong in another. If it is wrong in one part of the country it must be wrong in all parts. Why allow the States to control in one case and refuse them control in another? Why not take from New York all of her pilot jurisdiction? Why not wipe out the system of State pilotage entirely and give the Federal Government complete control? Why specify this law and the coastwise sailing vessels? Why rob the States of all control of such pilotage to secure special legislation for a favored few whose interests are already more protected than those of any other American citizens engaged in any industry, maritime or otherwise?

One argument, Mr. Speaker, advanced in favor of this bill is that the compulsory fees have almost ruined shipowners. You have heard the figures given. Let us see how true that is. Here is an extract from a recent number of the Marine Journal, a New York newspaper published in the interest of the shipowners:

> Mr. DINGLEY argues that the impoverished condition of the merchant marine calls for the abolishment of this pilot's fee, while the fact is (and we have it from the best authority, a large schooner owner) that coastwise vessels of modern build have been earning annually 30 per cent net for the past three years.
>
> Another gross misrepresentation was made by Mr. Van Brunt, of this city. At a recent meeting of the vessel owners he said that the pilots of the eleven Southern States where the compulsory pilotage existed received $500,000 per annum from coastwise vessels, when the fact is they do not receive above $100,000.

Now, sir, listen to the Savannah News, a leading newspaper in the South:

> These shipowners, on account of their wealth, are able to exert a great deal of influence at Washington. They have the means to pay attorneys and lobbyists, and therefore are remarkably successful in getting such legislation as they want. Within the last year or two they have succeeded in getting their vessels released from all custom-house fees and about all other fees. They have the benefit of the light-houses, buoys, and other aids to navigation free of cost.

And I might add, sir, that under our laws they have the exclusive use of the sea for coastwise purposes.

> A few years ago they paid into the custom-houses, for various things from which they received benefits, about $1,200,000 yearly. Now they do not pay a cent. These shipowners do not get any subsidies directly, but they get them indirectly.

And I will add, sir, that their monopoly is more valuable than any subsidy.

> They can not truthfully complain that coastwise shipping is suffering. As a matter of fact, it is prospering. The shipowners are getting rich, their investments in vessels paying them from 25 per cent to 50 per cent. Ship builders can not supply the demand for sailing vessels. There does not seem to be any reason why aid should be extended directly or indirectly to any interest that does not need it. It is our foreign trade that is languishing, not our coastwise trade.

Sir, if American vessels engaged in our foreign trade can have to-day the same monopoly and the same privileges enjoyed by those in our coastwise trade, you will never hear a whimper from their owners concerning their pilot dues; American shipping would quickly revive and the American flag float in every sea.

The facts and the figures bear out the statement of the newspapers. The shipbuilding interest in this country is as prosperous to-day, or nearly as prosperous, as it ever was. It at least has not suffered more than any other industry in these hard times, and vessel owners are not entitled to special legislation in their behalf at the expense of other and poorer citizens. Here is the Marine Journal, which I exhibit, and here is a clipping of two columns in one week of ships being built, and its editor did not begin to get all of them that were under way at that time. I will not read it. There are over two columns in all. But the names of the vessels and of the builders are given. I will not read them, but simply exhibit them, with two columns printed in the succeeding week.

Do these lists indicate that either shipowners or shipbuilders are growing poorer? Could there be stronger evidence of their prosperity in proportion to the prosperity of other trades and industries?

Another argument advanced in support of this measure is that steam coasting vessels are not required to take State pilots. I have already described how this provision was smuggled through the House. But the conditions are different. The motive power of the one is on board and under perfect control; that of the other is the elements. One is run by a steam engine; the other depends upon the winds and waves. The steamship can run into harbor in the teeth of a gale and keep the channel without effort. The sailing vessel is at the mercy of the gale. Adverse winds drive her from her course and she is ever in danger from a lee shore. Currents may twist her and tides throw her from her course. Oft-times, in very sight of port, she is compelled to put back to sea. The steamship is free from these hindrances. Nor is this all. Steamships usually make regular and frequent trips between certain ports. The officers acquire sufficient knowledge of the route to sail their vessels into and out of harbors which they are visiting regularly every few days.

Sailing vessels as a rule have no regular routes. They may not visit a particular port more than once a year. They are dependent upon the winds and the waves, and their officers can have no such knowledge of the harbors they enter as the officers of the steamships running on regular trips. State pilots can pilot any vessel, steam or sail. They know the channel and currents, day and night. Not so with United States steamboat pilots. Put one of them upon a sailing vessel near a strange port and he would be like a fish out of water. He would not always go where he wanted to go and he would be eternally listening for the music of the bells. He might be ready to stop and start and back her, but the winds would bother him. He would never know when to bring her into stays, slack her jib sheet, or lower a topsail. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, right here this bill proposes to make a pilot out of the captain or the mate or the second mate of any ship.

Mr. FOOTE. Or the cook?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Or the cook, as my friend says. So that if this bill becomes a law a vessel could leave the port of Seattle or Tacoma, come around Cape Horn, and up to Sandy Hook. Her mate or her cook, licensed by a Government inspector at Seattle, who may never have seen the Hook, is authorized—and his owners would probably compel him—to try the Gedney Channel, the Swash Channel, or the main ship channel, and bring the ship into the port of New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, he can do that now, can he not, under the present law?

Mr. CUMMINGS. He can try to do it under a State law, but not farther south. Even New York pilots sometimes fail in entering the port of New York. One put a vessel ashore the other day in the main ship channel; and if a regular pilot who has served his apprenticeship in the waters around New York has such trouble in taking ships into that harbor, what chance would a Seattle pilot have? Still your law would give him that privilege in ports unknown and in defiance of State laws. The owner of the vessel does not care, for if she is wrecked she is well insured.

Mr. SIMPKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The gentleman was kind enough to yield to me, and I will, with pleasure.

Mr. SIMPKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman in what way this bill affects the port of New York in the slightest degree?

Mr. CUMMINGS. It affects the State of New York to this degree, that if another vessel goes ashore at Long Branch with a loss of 400 lives, you deprive the legislature of the State of New York of the power to reenact that law for the safety of life and property. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know the name of the sailing vessel that carries passengers and that goes ashore in this way?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Oh, there are plenty of them. There are yachts that carry guests, and they are passengers. There is a yachting fleet that goes out from New York each year——

Mr. SIMPKINS. You do not contend that this compulsory pilotage law is enforced in New York State now?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I contend that the lives of the crew of a vessel are just as valuable as the life of any passenger on board. [Applause.]

But we are told by the gentlemen who desire to destroy the present system that the tugboat is to be utilized. Tugboat pilots are to supplant State pilots. Let us see. A tugboat pilot is a fair-weather pilot. He can not go out of port unless the weather is fair. It is in stormy weather that a pilot is most needed. There is not a man in this House who knows anything about a steam tug who would trust himself in one outside of any harbor in a gale. He knows that the boat would be swamped. The steam-tug pilot would be unable to serve sailing vessels when his services were needed the most. At such times he would be like the Dutchman's anchor, always ashore in a storm. How much use to a ship would a pilot be who was in charge of a tug towing it in a tornado or blinding storm? New York pilots last year cruised three, four, and five hundred miles to sea. No tugboat ever goes that distance. You rarely find one 20 miles out, and unless there is every prospect of continued fair weather you will not find one out of sight of land.

Another point. Destroy the pilot boats and you are at the mercy of the tug owners. They would raise the rates for tows, and eventually it would cost as much, if not more, to get into port as it does now under the existing pilotage system.

The pilots are no fair-weather birds. In storm and in sunshine they hover around our ports like gulls, ever ready to bring the weary mariner into a safe harbor. There are tempests so fierce that even the gulls are driven into our bays and estuaries, but the pilot is ever at his post. No gale, however terrible, drives his boat to harbor. His ship never sails home till all its crew are transferred to vessels needing their services. One word in regard to the New York pilots. I have been with them on their cruises. I have been nineteen days at sea with them out of sight of land. You have little idea of the dangers to which they are exposed. The New York pilots own their own boats. The loss since 1853 has been 37 pilot boats owned by New York and New Jersey pilots. In the blizzard several years ago 9 boats went down, and 2 were never afterwards heard of. During the blizzard in March, 1895, 2 boats were lost. Not a word has ever been heard from one, the Waring, since she left port. All pilots are subjected to similar dangers.

These are the men whom you propose to cripple so as to add to the profits of wealthy shipowners and shipbuilders. They earn their bread facing death upon the ocean while those who seek to reduce their fees are asleep upon downy beds in steam-heated rooms. Did avarice and greed ever join hands for a more unworthy purpose?

Some one has said that this is the reign of greed. Truly, so it seems.

It will be observed that this bill proposes to license pilots under the Steamboat-Inspection Service. I venture to say that there is no bureau under the Government to-day more incompetent for this service. What does the local inspector at Norfolk know about the coast line south of him that would warrant him in commissioning a pilot for any harbor between Norfolk and Savannah, the next port where a local inspector is to be found? Would a pilot thus licensed begin to compare with a local pilot who has been familiar with the harbor at which he is stationed since boyhood?

State pilotage laws are made for the protection of the public and commerce and not for the benefit of the pilots alone. Compulsory pilotage works both ways. It not only compels coastwise sailing vessels to take pilots, but it compels the pilots to guard the approaches to your harbors. A pilot must be at his station at all times, vessel or no vessel. The law appears to have been made in justice to the pilot as well as to the public. He is compelled by State laws to board any vessel that hoists her signal. Let her be infected with disease, short of provisions or of spars or sails necessary for safe navigation into port, and he must board her and take his chances with those on board. Even if the vessel be leaky and unseaworthy, he must take the wheel. No condition of the ship relieves him of his sworn obligation to board and take her into port. This being the case, what is more just than that the vessel should bear the same relation to the pilot in point of compulsion that the pilot bears to the vessel? The same legislative power that makes a pilot's duty compulsory makes it compulsory on the part of the vessel to take a pilot when hailed by one.

The mere granting of authority by inspectors of boilers and hulls can not make a pilot. He must have a progressive course of training. The State commissioners of pilotage, who now grant licenses, insist upon an apprenticeship at the port at which the pilot is to be stationed. In Georgia it requires ten years' service before authority is given to pilot a vessel. This is four times as long as it takes to make a doctor or a lawyer. These pilots are placed under bonds and oaths. In New York a preparatory training of five years is required. After that, to make sure that the pilot is fitted for his work, he is examined by the board of pilotage commissioners and two of the oldest pilots of the port. He must have an accurate knowledge of the tides, soundings, bearings, and distances of the several shoals, rocks, bars, and points of land and night lights of navigation and other matters. He must be of good moral character and temperate habits. If, with all this, he has sufficient skill and experience to act as a pilot, then, and then only, the commissioners grant him a license for piloting vessels to and from the port of New York by way of Sandy Hook. But even then, before the license is granted, the pilot must give bond, with two sureties, each in the penal sum of $500, that he will diligently and faithfully perform his duties and observe the rules and regulations of the board. He is liable to forfeitures, fines, and penalties for any mismanagement or neglect of duty.

Thus you see that this compulsory business is even more binding upon the pilot than upon the vessel owner.

One main feature of the bill is that it virtually forces the master or mate of coastwise sailing vessels to secure a license from the local inspector whether he wants it or not. It is necessary to take it out to save his situation. A few captains may own shares in their vessels, but the majority of the captains and mates are undoubtedly employees. They are not urging the passage of this measure. It is their employers who urge it. Their wages would probably not be increased one dollar, while their responsibilities and risks would be more than doubled. If the captains, mates, and crews of these big schooners were consulted they would beseech this House upon bended knees not to throw upon them the risk of piloting their vessels into our ports. No men know the advantage of the present system better than they do. They know that they will be held responsible for the navigation of their ships when entering dangerous harbors. They know the dangers of taking the chances of losing a vessel to save a pilotage fee of five or twenty-five dollars. It is a risk which they do not seek. It is a responsibility which if they could be heard would be left with the trained pilots. These depend not upon the charts of the Coast Survey for their knowledge of shifting channels and varying tides and currents, but upon actual observation. The officers and crews know well that if the vessel is lost the owner gets his insurance and can buy another, but if they lose their lives no insurance can reach their wives and little ones. These officers and crews are not asking Congress to destroy the business of pilotage as it has existed since the first Congress. They would send in a protest against this measure that would shake the walls of the Capitol if they dared.

I say that the passage of this bill will not only endanger property and human life, reduce the fees of the State pilots, and in some cases destroy their business altogether, but that it is inhuman to force upon the captains and the crews of our coastwise sailing vessels the additional risks and dangers.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SIMPKINS] said that the laborers took no interest in this bill. Well, he apparently does not read labor newspapers. The Knights of Labor, the American Federation of Labor, and numberless trades unions have passed resolutions asking Congress to defeat this bill. Sir, you must have received a Knight of Labor paper last week. I found one in my letter box, and it convinced me that they did take an interest in the bill, and a very lively interest.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask the gentleman to allow me ten or fifteen minutes more.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I understand the gentleman only wishes a few more minutes to conclude. I yield him ten minutes.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Now, Mr. Speaker—I see you are in the chair [laughter]—[Mr. DALZELL had occupied the chair]—it is made the duty of the pilots of Delaware Bay to remain always outside of the bay to succor any vessels that need aid. It is their duty under a provision of the State legislature. I hold up before the House a list of the vessels that they have helped in one year. Here you see it. There are three columns of it. There are over 90 vessels named on the list.

The Virginia pilots are also required to be outside of Hampton Roads "on station"; and the pilots of nearly all the Southern ports are in the same list. They are required to be there by law, and the shipowners kick because they are taxed under the State law to support this service. The State law requires their presence. If this State law is satisfactory to you, the law that requires compulsory pilotage, as you call it, ought not to be repudiated. You want all the cream and somebody else is to take the skim milk. Favors ought to be easy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not like to refer to England. I have no particular love for England, for English laws, for English customs, Englishmen, or English ambassadors; but I do say this: England is a maritime country. She finds it necessary to sustain a coastwise pilotage system. All coastwise vessels over 100 tons burden are subjected to pilotage dues in England to-day. Other European countries employ the same system. Here is the Kingdom of Norway and Sweden. Norway only a few years ago repealed its coastwise pilotage laws, but its Folksthing, or Congress, has passed a bill restoring these laws, and they are in force to-day.

We ought to glean wisdom from the experience of others. In addition to all the arguments that I have made against this bill, the practice to-day on the other side of the Atlantic speaks for itself, for if there is anything free that England can get and that she does not get, including free trade, I have failed to discover it. [Applause.]

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SIMPKINS]—and I believe he is honest—laid great stress upon the fact that there had been old pilots hanging about the corridor of this House for the last forty days endeavoring to defeat this bill. Well, they had good cause to hang around the corridor. I saw in the corridor a myrmidon of mugwumpery—one Chamberlain, the champion of this bill, the Commissioner of Navigation of the United States—lobbying in the interest of this bill. I know three members whom he importuned to vote for it. Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, has removed from the governorship of Arizona one Mr. Hughes, accused of telegraphing to members of Congress urging them to aid in the passage of some school bill. If my friends on the other side have any regard for the Commissioner of Navigation they will allow this bill to be defeated, for if carried, and President Cleveland proves true to the rule that he has laid down in the case of Governor Hughes, of Arizona, Mr. Chamberlain will "navigate" out of Washington very speedily. [Applause.]

There is very good reason for the presence here of old pilots. One of them, who has seen over fifty years of service, has importuned me time and time again until he has made me very tired sometimes; but he has the starving widows and orphans of the dead pilots ever before him. These men are organized. They have a sort of cooperative society, as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SIMPKINS] has intimated; but it is a cooperative society for the benefit of the widows and orphans of pilots who have lost their lives at sea. They have a pension fund, and 300 widows and orphans are sustained by it to-day. They do not come to Congress to seek pensions; they pension their own widows and orphans; and if this bill is passed, away goes that pension fund, and those widows and orphans are again thrown upon the mercy of the world. And all this to increase the profits of shipowners!

One point I had forgotten. I speak of it because I am personally familiar with it. No chart issued by the Government can accurately lay down the channels in the Southern ports. They shift with the action of the rivers which empty into the sea. Take the port of New Smyrna, Fla. I have been there and know whereof I say. The sands on the outer bar shift at least once every six weeks—sometimes every two weeks. The pilots are day and night sounding these bars, gauging the shifting of the sands. I have been with them engaged in the work. Twenty years ago Captain Swift, of New Bedford, was cutting live oak in Turnbull Swamp, back of New Smyrna. Without the services of the Florida pilots some of his vessels would have been lost. The schooner that left the port in one month found the channel changed on her return in the next month. The shifting of the sands resulted in the death of Gen. A. E. Torbert, who was on the ill-fated Vera Cruz. They also caused the death of Gen. Orville E. Babcock, who was constructing a Government light-house at Mosquito Inlet. They lost their lives before they could secure the services of Florida pilots who knew the shifting of the sands on the bar. If other vessels had tried to enter the port by chart, even with a pilot's certificate from steamboat inspectors in Norfolk, many lives would have been lost. The tides and currents would have shifted the channels, and false charts would have shipwrecked their vessels. The loss of the Kearsarge on Roncador Reef is a case in point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask the gentleman from Florida to allow me two or three minutes more.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, a statement was made on this floor concerning pilotage in cases where service was not rendered. I find in the New York Herald this morning a statement relating to that subject, a portion of which I will read. Speaking of this matter the writer says:

> The law requires that pilot boats shall be cruising day in and day out, month in and month out, year in and year out, at sea, watchful sentinels at all times, in all kinds of weather, as long as the best sea boats can live, compelled by law, and never shrinking, to render aid and assistance to all vessels seeking or requiring it, riding upon the storm for days at times without the reward of one dollar, periling and sometimes losing their lives and property in the performance of this duty; at all times at the call of those desiring a pilot, though licensed, and often in bad weather piloting them to safety; a sure and certain restraint upon tugboats and others from exorbitant charges for services to masters of vessels, because the State pilots' charges are fixed by law; bound to succor them if their crews are ill or their vessels disabled from any cause; a living and ever-present safeguard to master, owner, and insurance companies, and, lastly, quarantine officers to the adjacent ports and life-saving stations to worn out and wretched crews.
> If this is not full and complete service for the paltry sum of 10 cents per ton for one year, then we can not comprehend sufficient recompense for so small a charge.
>
> H. HORBINSON,
> President American Pilot Association.
> WASHINGTON, D. C., April 7, 1896.

This explains itself. I thank the gentleman from Florida and the House for its courtesy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a privileged report.

The report was read, as follows:

> The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5161) "making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:
>
> That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 9, 10, 13, 14, 15, 26, 33, 34, 35, and 46.
> That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, and 52, and agree to the same.
> Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:
>
> In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "One appointment clerk, $2,000."
>
> And the Senate agree to the same.
> Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed insert the following:

"Ninety-four thousand three hundred and forty dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

J. W. WADSWORTH,
V. WARNER,
JOHN S. WILLIAMS,
Managers on the part of the House.
S. M. CULLOM,
WILKINSON CALL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the managers on the part of the House was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House beg to submit the following statement in regard to the action of the conferees:

The bill as passed by the House carried $3,215,392, and as passed by the Senate $3,333,652.

The committee of conference has agreed to a net reduction from the amount carried by the bill as passed by the Senate of $78,120; and the amount carried by the bill as agreed to in conference is $3,302,792.

The increases agreed to by the conferees are:

Salaries, office of Secretary, appointment clerk (net increase)	$200
Salaries, Division of Soils	5,300
Salaries, Division of Agrostology	8,100
Total increases	13,600

The reductions agreed to by the conferees are:

Division of Seeds	$13,720
Soil investigations	5,000
Grass investigations	8,000
Publication of reports on cattle and dairy farming	65,000
Total reduction	91,720
Total increase as above	13,600
Net reduction	78,120

Amendment numbered 6 was agreed to by the House conferees because, after consideration, it was deemed unnecessary to change the existing organization in the Department.

Amendment numbered 11, increasing the amount appropriated for the Division of Chemistry by $5,000, was agreed to on the part of the House managers, as it restores the amount to the sum estimated for; and the managers, after consultation and further investigation, concluded that the amount estimated for was not excessive.

Amendment numbered 15 (which must be considered in connection with No. 50) strikes from the bill the clause making statutory certain salaries in the Division of Seeds. This clause was stricken out for the reason that under the new method of procuring the seeds for distribution no more than three or four temporary employees will be necessary, and the lump-sum appropriation of $150,000 will be more than ample for the purchase and the general expenses of distributing even an increased allowance of seeds.

Amendment numbered 30 was agreed to on the part of the managers of the House for the reason that the usefulness of the work of investigating irrigation processes, so far as the Agricultural Department is concerned, is at an end, and that future work in this direction can only properly be done by the Geological Survey.

Amendments numbered 40, 41, and 42: The managers on the part of the House agree to the rearrangement of the different sums provided by this section of the House bill for the reason that after consultation they are agreed that the House was mistaken as to the amount of money which will be expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, for farmers' bulletins, and that $50,000 will not be more than sufficient for the publication of these bulletins during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, there being a constant and growing demand for these publications; and also that the sum of $15,000 for illustrating, engraving, lithographing, etc., will be ample.

The other amendments which have been agreed to by the House conferees are mostly immaterial to the substance of the bill, and refer chiefly to its language.

J. W. WADSWORTH.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report, and on that I ask for the previous question.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be heard on this report for a few moments.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is ordered there will be twenty minutes on either side for debate; or the gentleman from New York can yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire and then move the previous question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Pending the demand for the previous question, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I notice that the statement which accompanies this report says that the House was mistaken as to the amount of money required to defray the necessary expenditure for farmers' bulletins. Certainly the records of the Agricultural Department, as they have been given us, do not justify that conclusion. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1894, less than $10,000 was expended for Farmers' Bulletins. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, there was less than $25,700 expended for that purpose; and as the statutes then in existence required, and as the present statutes require, that an equal two-thirds of all the farmers' bulletins shall be given to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, to be distributed by them, it is impossible that any growing demand on the part of the people at large for these bulletins can be satisfied legally unless the quota of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates be also increased, and that has not been done.

Now, as only one-half of $50,000 has been expended for this purpose in any one fiscal year prior to this time, I would like to have the gentleman in charge of this bill explain how it is possible to expend $50,000 legitimately for that purpose in the coming fiscal year. There does not seem to be any possible way of doing it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in the fiscal year 1894 the work of publishing the farmers' bulletins was in its beginning, and it is true that very little of the appropriation was expended that year, because the Department was not really prepared; it could not get the bulletins in proper form for publication in time. It is also true that in 1895 there was only about $25,000 expended, for substantially the same reason. But during the present fiscal year they have expended already $32,000, and, going on at the same ratio, they will have spent by the 30th of June next, the end of the fiscal year, between forty-five and forty-six thousand dollars, and the Department urged that this appropriation of $50,000 should not be reduced, because the demand for the bulletins is constantly growing.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, that is an explanation which does not explain. The whole number of these bulletins now issued is, I believe, 34. About 26 of them were in print before the beginning of the present fiscal year. Now, everyone knows that it costs less to print from the plates already prepared than it does to set the bulletins in type and print the necessary number of copies. As the number of these bulletins can not be increased without the increase of the quota of Members, Senators, and Delegates, and as no such increase has been made, it seems to me impossible that the explanation of the Department can be correct, and therefore I think we ought not to appropriate this extra amount of money. Therefore, it seems to me that we are appropriating $25,000 extra in this individual case, in order that the Secretary of Agriculture, with his accustomed verbosity and inaccuracy, may say in the coming fiscal year he has made a great saving upon the appropriations of Congress, an opinion which somebody in the Department, according to the statement of the chairman of the committee, seems to have induced the committee to adopt.

I do not care to say anything further on this point; but I do wish it put on record that the statement made by the committee on this point is not accurate.

The question being taken, the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WADSWORTH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Before putting the question on the motion to adjourn, the Chair will lay before the House a report of the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 626) providing for disposals of lands on abandoned portions of the Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in Montana, and for the relief of certain settlers thereon;

A bill (S. 249) granting a pension to Charles E. Jones;

A bill (H. R. 5083) granting an increase of pension to A. H. McLaws;

A bill (H. R. 6644) granting a pension to Gen. John M. Thayer, United States Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 1141) granting a pension to Miss Mary A. Hull, dependent sister of John A. Hull, deceased, late of Company F, Eighty-first Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the late war of the rebellion; and

A bill (H. R. 4053) repealing chapter 148 of the Supplement of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. GROUT addressed the Chair.

Mr. PAYNE. I withdraw the motion to adjourn, if the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] wants to present a conference report.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HUTCHESON, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. NEILL, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEWART of Wisconsin, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. OVERSTREET, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. MILES, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BARRETT, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. COLSON, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. PEARSON, for ten days, on account of important business.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GROUT addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] desires to present a report to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. McMILLIN. I reserve all points of order.

Mr. WHEELER. There are other gentlemen, I think, who may want to reserve some points. As there is no quorum here, I think this matter might better go over until the morning. If I understand the nature of the report, it is a very important measure.

Mr. GROUT. There is no purpose to ask any action on the report.

Mr. WHEELER. I think some gentlemen wish to reserve some points——

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] asks merely that the report be printed and recommitted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the report? It has not been announced.

Mr. GROUT. It is the report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. WHEELER. I shall not make the point of no quorum.

Mr. GROUT. I simply ask that it be printed and recommitted.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. All points of order will be reserved. The question will be, of course, whether the bill must go again to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCMILLIN. There has been some question of that kind with reference to preceding bills.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be printed and recommitted.

There being no objection,

Mr. GROUT reported back, with amendments, from the Committee on Appropriations, the bill (H. R. 5210) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for contingencies, Indian Department, for the current fiscal year, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 9, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. HOAR, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, in response to a resolution of January 13, 1896, relative to the jails in the Indian Territory, transmitting letters from the United States marshals for the three districts of the Indian Territory, answering some of the inquiries in the resolution, and also a report made by Mr. Howard Perry, of that Department, of a recent examination of the jails of the Indian Territory; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a joint resolution calling for estimates of cost of further improvement of Providence River and Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island, a report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army on the subject; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a resolution adopted by the assembly of the State of New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 306, granting a pension to soldiers and sailors who were confined in so-called Confederate prisons; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Albany, April 7, 1896.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with the directions of the assembly of the State of New York, I have the honor to transmit herewith a certified copy of a resolution passed by the assembly on the 3d day of April, 1896.

Very respectfully, yours,

JNO. PALMER, Secretary of State.

Hon. ADLAI E. STEVENSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN ASSEMBLY, Albany, April 3, 1896.

On motion of Mr. Maccabe—

Whereas a bill is now before the Congress of the United States granting pensions to soldiers and sailors confined in so-called Confederate prisons;

Whereas many officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Federal Army and Navy were confined in so-called Confederate prisons for a great length of time, suffering unusual hardships and contracting diseases and disabilities difficult to fully prove under existing pension laws:

Therefore, for the purpose of doing justice to a specially deserving class of surviving veterans of the war,

Be it resolved, That the senators and representatives of the State of New York, in legislature assembled, believe in the justice and equity of House bill No. 306, to those that served our Government as prisoners of war during the war of the rebellion, and request the Senators and Representatives from this State in the Congress of the United States to use their influence in favor of the passage of said bill.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions, properly attested, be transmitted by the secretary of state to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and also to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

By order of the assembly.

A. E. BAXTER, Clerk.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
Office of the Secretary of State:

I have compared the preceding copy of resolution with the original resolution on file in this office, and do hereby certify that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof.

Given under my hand and the seal of office of the secretary of state, at the city of Albany, this 7th day of April, in the year 1896.

JNO. PALMER, Secretary of State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Central Union Mission of the District of Columbia, and a petition of the District Epworth League of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Washington, D. C., praying for the appointment of an impartial national commission of inquiry to investigate and report upon the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relation to crime, pauperism, taxation, and the general public welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yesterday I presented a petition of the mayor and a large number of citizens of Portsmouth, N. H., in reference to the Armenian question. I have a letter from the general secretary of the Armenian Relief Association. After expressing gratification at the fact that the citizens of New Hampshire had moved in this matter, he says:

It is not necessary for us to add any words to tell of the extreme urgency of the cause of the persecuted Armenians and other Christians in Turkey, who are doomed to extermination by the fanatical fury of the Sultan and his people unless the Christian world will awaken to its clear duty before God and humanity. Will you permit us to express the earnest hope that you will use your influence to urge upon the United States Senate the absolute necessity of not only taking every necessary measure for the protection of American interests and of American honor and prestige in Turkey, but also, as the supreme legislature of earth's greatest country, to take the opportunity as well as to respond to the duty which is before them in the defense of the cause of justice and humanity by the suppression of the most appalling and inhuman atrocity ever recorded in the history of the world? I have the honor to be, dear sir,

Very faithfully, yours,

HERANT MESROB KIRETCHJIAN,
General Secretary.

I wish I could know that it is in our power to do something for this suffering people. It is not for me even to make a suggestion to the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body, but I desire to have the letter referred to that committee, and trust that at some time in some way we may be able to exert some influence in behalf of the people who are suffering such terrible atrocities in Asia Minor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter, in the nature of a petition, will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of the executive committee of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Kings County, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the protection of Americans in Turkey and extending sympathy to the suffering Armenians; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURROWS presented a memorial of Council No. 11, American Protective Association, of Grand Rapids, Mich., remonstrating against the appropriation of public money for sectarian purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Barnegat, N. J., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the memorial of Ambrose Secor and 78 other citizens of Bayonne, N. J., remonstrating against the placing of the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BATE presented a petition of 47 citizens of Centerville, Tenn., praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VEST presented resolutions adopted by the Merhcants' Exchange of St. Louis, Mo., relative to the improvement of the Mississippi River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ELKINS presented the petition of W. E. Adams and 237 other citizens of West Virginia, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. 1268) for the relief of Daniel K. Shields, heretofore introduced by him; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of the Presbytery of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of House bill No. 7441, to protect State antigambling laws, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TELLER presented a petition of the International Association of Machinists of Denver, Colo., praying for an investigation of the treatment of employees in the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Navy-Yard and other navy-yards in the country; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the North Side Woman's Club, of Highlands, Colo., praying that the statue of Père Marquette be allowed a place in Statuary Hall; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Erie, Colo., remonstrating against the placing of the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition of the Christian Endeavor Society of the First Congregational Church of Denver, Colo., praying for the enactment of legislation regulating the sale and taxing of intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Theodore H. Dodd Post, No. 3, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Colorado and Wyoming, of Golden, Colo., praying for the enactment of a service-pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Federal Union, No. 6332, of Lincoln, Nebr., a petition of the Cotton and Woolen Workers' Union, No. 6499, of Galveston, Tex., and a petition of the American Federation of Labor, of Dowagiac, Mich., praying for the free and unlimited coinage of silver; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THURSTON presented a petition of the city council of Council Bluffs, Iowa, a petition of the Commercial Club of Fairhaven, Wash., and a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Denver, Colo., praying that an appropriation be made for the transmississippi international exposition to be held at Omaha, Nebr., in 1898; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Kilpatrick Post, No. 82, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Nebraska, of Oakdale, Nebr., praying for the passage of a service-pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT OF HOMESTEAD LAWS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the argument made by Hon. H. R. Pease, before the Senate Committee on Public Lands, April 3, 1896, relative to the existing policy respecting the manner of disposing of the public lands known as the Indian reservation lands, be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, to accompany Senate bill No. 1571.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. CARTER on the 7th instant, making an appropriation to continue the construction of buildings at the Fort Harrison Military Post, Mont., intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported it favorably, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 163) to amend the act approved August 1, 1894, making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, etc., reported it without amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. HILL on the 2d instant, providing for the establishment of gas buoys in the St. Lawrence River, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 279) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Bernhard Steuber, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon February 20, 1896, providing for the appointment of a commission to determine the correct boundary lines of the Klamath Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill, reported it with an amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. ROACH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 122) granting a pension to Jerusha Sturgis, widow of Brig. Gen. Samuel D. Sturgis, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2585) to establish a life-saving station at Port Huron, on the coast of Lake Huron, Michigan, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2782) to establish a life-saving station at or near Fort Gratiot, Mich.; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2383) to provide a life-saving station at or near Hampton, in the State of New Hampshire, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2783) to establish a life-saving station on the coast of New Hampshire or Massachusetts, between Hampton and the Merrimac rivers; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1959) to restore John F. Lewis to the United States Army, with the rank of captain of infantry, and place him upon the retired list, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and to submit a report thereon.

I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to take the bill up and continue its consideration as soon as the Indian appropriation bill is finished.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Meanwhile the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3448) authorizing the county of Navajo, Territory of Arizona, to issue bonds for the construction of a court-house and jail at the county seat thereof, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

LIEUT. HERBERT CUSHMAN.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 110) for the relief of Lieut. Herbert Cushman was indefinitely postponed, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 2784) amending section 1225 of the Revised Statutes, concerning the detail of army officers as instructors at educational institutions; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2785) for the relief of Ira Miller, of Valparaiso, Ind.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRITCHARD (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2786) for the relief of Alexander Swicegood and H. H. Swicegood; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 2787) granting a pension to Simpson Everett Stilwell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2788) for the creation of a United States commissioner to treat with a commissioner for each Christian nation of the world for the correction of the intolerable evil, so persistently and still continuing, in the shape of the Ottoman Empire, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2789) to elect the Board of Commissioners for the District of Columbia by popular vote; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. If I may be permitted a single word, I will state that this bill, which I have only casually looked at, provides that the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall be increased to five members, who shall be elected by popular vote. I will say that if I had my way, I would put the District of Columbia under the well-established doctrine that there shall not be taxation without representation. But that is impossible under existing conditions. If a change in the number of the Commissioners were to be made and if I were to have my way I should reduce the number from three to one in place of increasing it to five.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2790) for the relief of Sophronia S. Stowell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 2791) for the establishment, control, operation, and maintenance of the Northern Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, at Hot Springs, in the State of South Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2792) granting a pension to Henry Stutsman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2793) increasing the pension of Mrs. Hulda Shaw; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THURSTON introduced a bill (S. 2794) concerning the trial and punishment of contempts in the United States courts herein mentioned; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PEFFER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURROWS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PUGH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARTER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WARREN subsequently, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on this day, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, the amendment providing for the extension of the barracks and to make necessary sanitary improvements at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo., reported it without amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF THE RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. FRYE. I should like the attention of Senators for just one moment.

The Committee on Commerce have instructed me to give notice that they will be in session Friday, Saturday, and Monday next from half past 10 in the morning and during the entire day; that during those three days they will hear any Senators who desire to propose amendments to the pending river and harbor bill, and will not hear any afterwards.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like the attention of the Senator from Maine for a moment. Under the law as it now exists, I understand that it requires a joint resolution to get the information necessary for the offering of an amendment to the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. FRYE. In order to obtain from the War Department an estimate of a project, it is necessary to have a joint resolution passed.

Mr. HOAR. I thought it could be done by a concurrent resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to state that I had a joint resolution to obtain such an estimate passed through the Senate yesterday. It has gone to the other House, and I hope it will be passed there to-day, but I hardly think it can be signed by the President and the information obtained within the time indicated by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. As a matter of course, whenever a Senator presents an exceptional case like that the committee will hear him later.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; that will be satisfactory.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I gave notice that I would desire to submit some remarks this morning on the postal telegraph bill, and I ask the Senator from South Dakota to allow me to proceed at this time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to get the appropriation bill before the Senate first, and then I will yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Now I yield to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. MANTLE. I do not wish to stand in the way of the Senator from North Carolina, but I gave notice that I should like to consume a little of the time of the Senate to-day, and I believe that my notice was given in advance of that of the Senator from North Carolina, as is shown by the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the previous notice given by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. BUTLER. I give way to the Senator from Montana, of course, as a right to which he is entitled; and it would be a matter of courtesy if he did not have the right. I shall ask leave to follow him this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE REVENUE BILL AND SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. MANTLE. I send to the desk the resolution submitted by my colleague [Mr. CARTER] some days ago, and ask that it be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CARTER February 19, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill H. R. 2749, reported by the Committee on Finance with an amendment, be recommitted to that committee for further consideration.

Mr. MANTLE. Mr. President, I wish to say it had not been my expectation or intention thus early in my service in this Chamber to take any active part in debate, my desire having been to first familiarize myself as much as possible with the methods of conducting and transacting the public business before presuming to claim the attention or take up the time of this body. More than this, Mr. President, I recognize in myself a very humble member of this great legislative forum, and being profoundly impressed with the great learning which distinguishes its membership, I have felt and now feel that possibly nothing which I might say could throw any additional light upon the questions here discussed. But events of a somewhat unusual character have recently transpired here, involving an apparent disagreement among Republicans as to certain alleged party measures, and these events have in turn brought forth from certain newspapers of the country such a continuous storm of unqualified abuse and misrepresentation, directed at myself and four of my Republican colleagues as well as the constituency which we in part represent, that as a simple matter of duty I am led to abandon my original intention and to beg the considerate indulgence of the Senate for a brief time while I give utterance to a few words in support of my position and in contradiction of the unwarranted aspersions which have been cast at those of us who have refused blindly and unquestioningly to accept a programme of tariff legislation which fails to commend itself to our judgment as being either wise or just or in accord with Republican principles.

I wish to say in advance that, while I have my own convictions as to the justice and wisdom of certain policies relating to the conduct of our Government, and while I shall vote to sustain those convictions until convinced by argument or changing conditions that I am in error, at the same time I shall always do so with the utmost respect for the opinions of those who differ with me. I have no sympathy whatever with those advocates of any policy who indulge the opinion that all who are opposed to them are actuated by selfish or unpatriotic motives.

Mr. President, I have grown up from childhood among the people of the West, in what are now known as the silver States. I think I may therefore justly say that I know something of their character, something of their lives, their hopes, and their ambitions. And it is for this reason that I feel impelled to say a few words in their defense and to repel the unjust and indiscriminate charges of lawlessness, of selfishness, and lack of patriotism which it seems to be the fashion just now upon the part of the metropolitan press of the East to bring against them, as well as their representatives upon this floor—charges which I deeply regret to note have recently found expression to some extent through the Chief Executive of the nation, and that, too, in a notable Christian gathering which, it would seem to me, over and above all others, should have been found exercising that rare virtue of charity which was the distinguishing trait of Him in whose name and for whose cause they were gathered together, rather than to have made it the occasion for a wholesale, uncharitable, and untruthful arraignment of a great mass of their fellow-citizens who are bound to them by every tie of kindred, of religion, and of citizenship.

But, Mr. President, these ill-natured charges against the Western States, and particularly against what are known as the silver States, are not true. I believe I may truthfully say that they have their origin in the fact that the representatives of those States in this body hold financial opinions and have seen fit to cast their votes in opposition to the views and the wishes of the present Administration and its Republican sympathizers and supporters. I assert without fear of successful contradiction that in every attribute of good citizenship, in industry and sobriety, in respect for law and property, in obedience to constituted authority, in reverence for religious forms, and in point of public spirit the citizens of the silver States will easily take rank with those of any other State in this Union. Further than this, Mr. President, I assert that within a radius of 5 miles of Carnegie Hall, in the city of New York, where the Presbyterian Home Mission Society recently held its meeting to beg funds with which to convert the wicked people of the "badly regulated municipalities" and "undesirable States" of the West, there is twenty times more of squalid poverty, of pauperism, of ignorance, of crime and criminals, than can be found in all the silver-producing States of the West combined.

I do not make these declarations lightly nor without some investigation of the subject. In order to bear out my statement I have made a few comparisons between the five silver-producing States of the West which are characterized as "rotten boroughs," "pocket boroughs," "mining camps," "corrupt communities," etc., and five of the very old, very respectable, and highly civilized States of the East, namely, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, New York, and Pennsylvania, all of them except one being members of the original thirteen States which formed the Union. I have prepared some tables of comparison, which I will ask permission to have printed with my remarks, as I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate in reading them at length. I may state, however, briefly, that these tables show, for instance, that in the so-called silver States the percentage of illiterates to the total population is 4.3, while in the five Eastern States named it is 6.9, or greater in the East than in the West.

Among the foreign-born population of the silver States the percentage of illiteracy is 8.9, while among the foreign-born citizens of the 5 Eastern States it is 21, or nearly three times as great.

The wealth per capita of the 5 silver States is $2,859. For the 5 Eastern States it is $1,145, being less than half as much.

The total State, county, municipal, and school debt per capita in the 5 silver States is $13.71. In the 5 Eastern States it is $27.58, being more than double.

The expenditure of money for the support of the schools may be taken as a fair index of the character of a people. In the silver States I find that it is $15.58 per capita per annum. In the 5 Eastern States it is only $11.27 per capita per annum.

The percentage of debt in force against the value of all taxed real estate in the 5 silver States is only 6.64. In the 5 Eastern States it is 18.73, being nearly three times as much.

The number of paupers in a community may also safely be taken into account as reflecting in some degree its moral and material status. The number of paupers to each 100,000 of population in the 5 silver States is 53.1. In the 5 Eastern States it is 188.2, being nearly four times as great.

The percentage of increase in population during the decade from 1880 to 1890 in Colorado, Montana, Utah, and Idaho was 110.56, while in the 5 Eastern States it was only 14.85.

The tables are as follows:

Mr. President, one of the chief sources of complaint against the silver States is that they have an insufficient population to entitle them to the privileges of statehood, and yet there are four Eastern States—New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Delaware, three of them being members of the thirteen original States—which have a less population than the State of Colorado and which to-day have but a few thousand more than the States of Utah and Montana; and yet we hear of no one charging that these States are "rotten boroughs" or that their people are lacking in intelligence or patriotism because of their limited population. Two years ago the States of Montana and Wyoming were held up to public scorn and ridicule by the Eastern press as being totally incapable of self-government because their legislatures had failed to elect Senators. It was well known that the failure in these cases was due to the fact that there were three political parties represented and that neither had a majority of the votes necessary to elect; hence no election could be had except upon a surrender of their political convictions by one party or the other, and still the Eastern press, ignoring the exceptional conditions there existing, with one accord united in pouring upon the devoted heads of the citizens of those States a stream of the most bitter and insulting denunciation because of their failure.

Last spring we witnessed the spectacle of the legislature of the well-"regulated" and "desirable" State of Delaware, possessing a clear Republican majority, indulging in an unseemly and disgraceful wrangle for months without electing a Senator. The air was filled with insinuations and rumors of corruption in connection with that struggle, and finally a Senator was alleged to have been elected, and was sent here under circumstances which place a serious cloud upon his title; and, strange to say, not one of the great Eastern newspapers, to my knowledge, has yet charged that Delaware is therefore incapable of self-government and that it was a stupendous mistake that she was ever permitted to enter the family of States. And only a few days ago the Commonwealth of Kentucky, one of the proudest and richest of all the great States east of the Mississippi River, brought to a close a session of its legislature which, in its exhibition of bitter partisan and personal strife, has perhaps never been equaled in the history of this nation. Its closing hours were marked by scenes of great violence and disorder, barely escaping bloodshed, and to this was added the strange, sad, and humiliating spectacle of armed troops invading the very sanctity of its legislative halls. This condition of affairs in Kentucky was also brought about by a Senatorial contest which resulted in no election, but so far I have failed to discover in any Eastern newspaper a charge that the people of Kentucky are ignorant, fanatical, unpatriotic, and generally unfit for the responsibilities of statehood.

Mr. President, I think it will be admitted by every fair-minded and unprejudiced critic in the light of the facts revealed by the census reports, that there is no basis whatever for these vindicative charges of inferiority, so freely brought by Eastern newspapers and others against Western communities. The simple truth is that the people of the silver States, in point of intelligence and moral worth, in their home lives, in their love of order, in their social status, in their civil and political organizations, and above all in their unswerving loyalty and devotion to everything that is truly American, are the peers of the citizens of any other section of our common country.

And why should they not be? The very localities along the Atlantic coast from which these unjust and unnatural criticisms of the West mainly come, have in fact furnished us with a very large percentage of our population. In the past they have been the chief sources of that great stream of migration which has spread beyond the great rivers, over the mountains and plains, and along the valleys, bearing aloft as it went the torch of civilization, blazing the trails and carving out of those barren wastes the vigorous, growing, and splendid young commonwealths which to-day stand as magnificent monuments to their sacrifices, their sufferings, and their indomitable courage.

The West is the child of the East. The same undaunted spirit, the same individual strength of character, the same enterprise and industry which have marked the wonderful growth and progress of the East, have also successfully met and conquered every obstacle and brought to its present phenomenal development that great empire of the West, which ought to be, and which I believe is, the pride of every fair-minded citizen of the Republic, no matter in what part of the Union he may dwell. Mr. President, there is not one of the older States that has not sent out to the silver States some of its most promising and ambitious sons and daughters, there to seek their fortune and to carve out for themselves, by their own thrift and energy in that land of equal opportunities, where the worship of Mammon has not yet supplanted the rule of equality, a niche in the temple of honest fame.

There is no story of hardship or danger, of suffering or privation, no act of self-sacrifice or tale of heroism, to be found in the history of the grand old Commonwealths of this Union, from the settlement of Jamestown and the landing of the Pilgrims on Plymouth Rock, that has not found its parallel in the struggles and trials attending the settlement and development of the Western States. And as the experiences of the pioneers in the earlier history of our country who settled upon the shores of the Atlantic Ocean, and of the Great Lakes, and upon the borders of the great rivers flowing into them, developed a race of men whom no danger could appall and whom no misfortune could long discourage, so also the hard experiences of the pioneers of the West have developed a brave, self-contained, and self-reliant people—a people who possess the courage of their convictions, a people "who know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain." The people of the West, like the people of the East, have a just pride in their achievements, in their institutions, and in their States. They also have their honest beliefs and opinions upon public questions and public policies, and in common with all self-respecting, independent people they claim the right to uphold and defend that which they believe to be just, and that, too, without being subjected to the ignorant, senseless, and baseless slanders which of late have filled the columns of the Eastern press.

It might be well for some of those who are just now engaged in traducing the West to take the census reports and a map, and make a brief study of that portion of the United States, to which most of them at present seem to be strangers. If they do, they will discover that the day is not so very far distant when the West is likely to dominate the East. They will find that "Westward the star of empire" still takes its way, and that every year the center of population of the United States is slowly but surely shifting in the direction of the setting sun. It is to the West that the crowded cities of the East must soon look for relief from the congested condition which now afflicts them, largely as a result of the depression in agriculture. It is to the West that the ambitious youth of the land must ere long turn for those opportunities in life which day by day are growing rarer and rarer in the overcrowded East. It is to the West that the immigrant from the Old World must soon journey in order to find the home which he seeks in the New. And in the near future it is from the great West, with its vast areas of territory, with its inexhaustible treasures of gold, silver, and copper, of lead, and coal, and iron; with its immense forests of timber, with its great rivers and water powers, and with its wonderful variety of soil, and its matchless climate, that must come a very large share of the wealth and resources which are to hold us in the front rank as the richest and most impregnable nation upon the face of the earth.

Mr. President, the immediate cause of the recent unqualified defamation of the people of the silver States is, first, because the Western Senators voted to substitute a free-silver-coinage bill for the House bond bill; and, secondly, because five Republican Senators from the silver States, in the exercise of their discretion and their constitutional right, recently voted against the consideration of the substitute for the House revenue bill at what seemed to them an inappropriate moment. In view of the criticisms which have since been passed upon our action, it may perhaps be well to examine briefly into the reasons which led to the introduction of the House revenue bill—known as the Dingley bill—and then to consider the bill itself for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is quite as unselfish and patriotic a measure as some would have us believe. And also to determine whether there is any ground for the charge of treachery to the Republican party, which has been preferred against those of us claiming to be Republicans who have taken the position that, in its present form, it ought not to become a law. In making this examination it is necessary to take into account the status of all the factors which must necessarily enter into the calculation when an attempt is to be made to formulate legislation and crystallize it into law. Any proposed legislation must of necessity be so framed as to command the support of a majority of both branches of Congress and so as to secure the approval of the President or insure its passage over his veto.

In the House at this time there is an overwhelming Republican majority in favor of a protective tariff—a majority sent there, I may add, not in opposition to silver, as is claimed, but rather as a protest of the people against the free-trade, gold-standard, and bond-selling policy of the present Administration. In the Senate there is a majority against a protective tariff, while the President is well known to be opposed to the protective system in general and to duties on raw material in particular. It was therefore manifestly essential to bear these varying conditions in mind, in the construction of any revenue measure which it was sincerely desired should become a law. The reason assigned for the hurried formulation and passage of the House revenue bill through the other branch of Congress, with scarcely a moment's time for deliberation or debate, was the imperative necessity for additional revenue to meet the current expenses of the Government, and the prompt action of the House was intended to be regarded as a generous and patriotic effort upon the part of the Republicans to rescue the Democratic Administration from the dangers and difficulties into which its own lack of statesmanship and unwise policies had plunged it. It was in this light that Republican orators and Republican newspapers presented the Dingley bill to the country. And I sincerely believe, Mr. President, that the great majority of Republicans in the other branch of Congress voted for the House revenue bill with this unselfish and patriotic purpose in view. But an examination of the measure leads me to feel that those who framed it sacrificed all possibility of its success and nullified its patriotic purpose by permitting selfish and sectional considerations to dictate its provisions.

The McKinley law was a high protective measure, so high, in fact, that many Republicans freely criticised the wisdom of its enactment; and there are Senators upon this floor who have charged the overwhelming defeat of the Republican party in 1892 to the McKinley law, and who would no doubt oppose its reenactment should the Republican party be restored to the control of the Government. There has probably never been a tariff measure proposed to Congress that so aroused Democratic opposition as did the McKinley bill, and yet in the face of these well-known facts the Ways and Means Committee of the other branch of Congress—and I refer to that committee with all proper courtesy and respect—have framed and sent to this body, with its antiprotection majority, and further propose to send to a free-trade Democratic President, for his approval, a so-called revenue measure which reenacts many of the extreme protective provisions of the McKinley law, and which restores to manufactures of woolens and carpets in particular, in some instances all and in others nearly all of the McKinley rates of duty!

Mr. President, it is upon this view of the matter that some of us have been inclined to believe that the authors of the House revenue bill never really expected it to become a law, and that its introduction and passage through the House was designed merely for political effect. If the authors of the House bill had been actuated by a sincere and patriotic desire to stop the deficit which is draining the Treasury, and if, as is claimed, that was their chief aim and purpose, the question naturally arises, why did they not frame a revenue measure that would have met the varying views upon revenue legislation held in this body, and one in line with the well-known opinions of the Chief Executive? Such a bill might have passed and become a law, as I believe there are Senators upon the other side of this Chamber who share with Republicans the view that the revenues of the Government are insufficient to meet its expenditures, and who might have joined in passing a measure not designed for partisan or special advantage. It is true that a "tariff for revenue only" is not in accord with Republican tradition; but neither is the ad valorem system, nor the horizontal system, yet both these vicious principles are recognized in the Dingley bill. And this fact of itself leads me to the inference that some Republicans are willing to sacrifice the principles of the party and to adopt any sort of tariff doctrine, provided only that it gives protection to certain sections and certain interests.

There seems to be two classes of Republicans who criticise us for our vote on February 25 last against the consideration of the Dingley bill. One class asserts that it is a revenue and not a protective measure, and that its provisions will yield $40,000,000 additional revenue per annum for the needs of the Government. The other class asserts that it is a protective measure, and that by our opposition we are viciously preventing our American manufacturers from supplying the home market. Now, it is manifestly impossible for both of these propositions to be true. If the bill would exclude foreign goods from our markets it certainly would not raise revenue, and if it did not exclude foreign goods from our markets then it would not help our manufacturers. Thus our critics may take either horn of the dilemma they choose. For myself I incline to the belief that it would not greatly increase the revenues. In the conference held between certain Philadelphia manufacturers and five Republican silver Senators of this body a few weeks ago, and which has since become somewhat famous, the only advocacy of the Dingley bill by the manufacturers present was upon the ground that it would shut out the products of other countries and thus leave to them the home market. If their statement of the case is true, how can anyone assert that the Dingley bill would increase the revenue? It must be that those who put forth the claim that this bill would increase the national income $40,000,000 per annum have simply computed the increased amount of duty on present importations, forgetting the important consideration that high tariffs may possibly lead to low revenues. If the Dingley bill is a mere revenue producer, then no manufacturing interest of this country has been injured by its failure to become a law. If, upon the other hand, its effect would be to stimulate home industry and exclude foreign goods to the extent claimed by our Republican critics, then I make the suggestion that it might very materially decrease instead of increase the national income.

Mr. President, it is charged by the Eastern Republican press that the five Republican Senators who voted against the Dingley bill are traitors to the Republican party. In order to sustain this charge it must be of course shown that the Dingley bill is a Republican measure. I deny that it is such; and in support of this denial I quote the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. In his remarks made on February 26 last, in speaking of the bill, he said:

> That bill does not belong to any party; it is not the representative of any party. * * * I do not think anyone can claim that that bill is a Republican measure, or that it is to be voted for by anyone upon that ground. * * * It is a bill prepared for an occasion, not a political one.

This authority ought to be accepted by the Eastern Republican press as conclusive upon this point as it is upon many others, the financial question in particular. The Senator from Ohio says that the Dingley bill is not even a partisan measure, and so I hope that those Republican journals which have been busy of late in reading us out of the party, for having refused to support what they mistakenly call a Republican measure, will kindly reconsider their action, and graciously permit us to remain until it can be shown that we have violated some cardinal principle of Republican faith.

Mr. President, when all the circumstances surrounding the occasion are considered, and when all the factors to be reckoned with are taken into account, I am forced to believe—with all due respect to those who framed it—that the House revenue bill is an unwise as well as unfair measure. It is an admixture of free trade, tariff for revenue only, and extreme protection. It utterly neglects some interests, and shows unusual favor to others. It protects the manufacturer of woolens and carpets, but fails utterly to give protection to the woolgrowers. It is therefore inequitable, unrepublican, and unjust, and does not deserve the support of the Republicans in this body.

Mr. President, my distinguished colleague, in his able and unanswerable speech a few days ago, so thoroughly dissected and exposed the incongruities and inequalities of this measure that it is unnecessary for me to discuss it fully in detail. I wish to say, however, that some time ago I addressed a letter to Judge William Lawrence, the president of the National Wool Growers' Association of the United States. He is beyond question the highest and best-informed authority upon the wool question, from the woolgrower's point of view, to be found in this country. This entitles his utterances upon this subject to great weight.

I will take the liberty of sending Judge Lawrence's reply to the Secretary's desk, and, with the permission of the Senate, I will ask to have it read. It is not very long, and as it is pertinent to this subject I should like very much that the Senate should hear it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

HON. LEE MANTLE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th on the subject of the Dingley wool-tariff bill.

* * * * * * *

You are correct in saying that "the bill takes pretty good care of the woolen manufacturers, while it fails utterly to afford the necessary protection to woolgrowers."

You will see it is shown in Senate Document No. 17, pages 47, 49, and 52, that woolgrowers in competition with Australian skirted merino get but little over half the nominal duty fixed by the law. The nominal duty of 6.6 cents in the Dingley bill (60 per cent of 11 cents) is in practical effect only 3.5 on our Ohio washed and less than 2 cents on unwashed. Thus the so-called tariff of 6.6 is not half the amount it appears to be, and will deceive people who do not understand it.

The wool manufacturer has in the law what is called a "compensatory duty"; that is, a duty given him because of the duty on wool. Now, the "compensatory duty" is in fact considerably more than "compensation," even if the duty on wool was what it seemed to be, but when you consider that it is not, the result is the "compensatory duty" is largely more than it seems to be—more, in fact, than the normal compensation. I have never alluded to this in any speech or publication, but the time is very nearly here when woolgrowers must raise the standard of revolt against the low duties afforded them and the vastly better duties given the wool manufacturers. I have never indulged in prejudice against New England, but it is about time that New England should recognize the fact that woolgrowers have some rights that New England is bound to respect.

* * * * * * * *

I notice your remark that if the Dingley bill becomes a law there is danger that the wool manufacturers, so well provided for, may hereafter confront us with the proposition that "it would be unwise to reopen the tariff discussion for fear of disturbing business conditions." Certainly there is danger of that, and if so, the free-wool men, backed by that argument and those who maintain it, would prevent any fair wool tariff hereafter. In view of the urgent necessity for even a little relief—a very little—to woolgrowers, I have not felt it proper for me to advise the defeat of the Dingley bill, but I have letters from able men—true friends of wool manufacturers and woolgrowers—who do think it is better to defeat the bill and take our chances for the future.

* * * * * * *

I invite your attention to the draft of a bill in Senate Document No. 17, pages 218-221, as one we might hope to have passed, except that possibly you might have to reduce the rates specified in paragraphs 10, 11, and 12. This draft omits the "skirting proviso" of the McKinley Act, which is, of course, retained in the Dingley bill. This omission would help us some. We suffer much by light shrinkage in scouring of Australian merino.

Yours, truly, WILLIAM LAWRENCE.

Mr. MANTLE. Mr. President, I wish to call special attention to what Judge Lawrence says respecting the "compensatory duty" given to woolen and carpet manufacturers. He shows conclusively that while this "compensatory duty" is nominally given to the manufacturer to compensate him for the duty on wool, as a matter of fact it gives him far more than a fair compensation. The Dingley bill gives to woolgrowers 60 per cent of the McKinley rates, but it gives to carpet manufactures all the specific duties of the McKinley law, and also the full ad valorem duties of the Wilson law. On four classes of carpets the ad valorem duties of the Wilson law are the same as the McKinley law. On three classes they are a trifle less, while on one class it is 2½ per cent higher. So that in one case the Dingley bill actually gives a higher protective duty than the much-abused McKinley law itself. I here attach a table showing the ad valorem duties of the McKinley and Wilson laws, which I ask to have printed with my remarks:

Table showing the ad valorem rates of the McKinley and Wilson laws.

* Higher than the McKinley law.

Mr. President, I desire to add further that the McKinley law placed a duty of 11 cents per pound upon wool of the first class; but owing to the "skirting clause," to which Judge Lawrence refers, and other defective provisions, the actual protective benefit which Western and Texas woolgrowers received was not one-third of that amount. I wish also to call attention to the fact that the price of wool steadily declined during the period that the McKinley law was in force, showing conclusively to my mind that it did not furnish the woolgrowers adequate protection. The Dingley bill fixes the rate on first-class wools at 6.6 cents per pound; but as it also reenacts all the loose and defective provisions of the McKinley law, the Western woolgrowers would manifestly receive no protective benefits worth speaking of.

Before leaving this subject I wish to call attention to the greatest danger which, in my judgment, menaces the majority of the woolgrowers in the United States. It lies in the constantly increasing importation of cheap, coarse wools. Formerly these wools were used only in the manufacture of carpets. Owing, however, to improved machinery and changing fashions, and because of their cheapness, these coarse wools are now being extensively used in the manufacture of clothing. Last year the importation of this class of wools exceeded by far that of all others combined. Among them was nearly 27,000,000 pounds of Chinese wool, the average import price of which, duty paid, was 5.15 cents per pound. Owing to its light shrinkage, this amount would equal upward of 40,000,000 pounds of a similar grade of American wool. The Dingley bill imposes an ad valorem duty of 32 per cent upon this class of wool, which, based upon last year's price, would amount to a specific duty only of 1.65 cents per pound. It is manifest that this rate of duty would afford no protection whatever, and but little revenue either.

I have taken some tables from the memorial of the National Woolgrowers' Association to Congress, bearing upon prices and other statistics relating to wool, which, if there is no objection, I will ask leave to print as part of my remarks:

SHOWING EFFECT OF THE "SKIRTING CLAUSE" OF THE M'KINLEY LAW, WHICH THE DINGLEY BILL PROPOSES TO REENACT.

2. The provisions of the McKinley Act to prevent frauds.

383. The duty upon wool of the sheep or hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals which shall be imported in any other than ordinary condition, or which shall be changed in its character or condition for the purpose of evading the duty, or which shall be reduced in value by the admixture of dirt or any other foreign substance, or which has been sorted or increased in value by the rejection of any part of the original fleece, shall be twice the duty to which it would be otherwise subject: Provided, That skirted wools as now imported are hereby excepted. Wools on which a duty is assessed amounting to three times or more than that which would be assessed if said wool was imported unwashed, such duty shall not be doubled on account of its being sorted. If any bale or package of wool or hair specified in this act imported as of any specified class, or claimed by the importer to be dutiable as of any specified class, shall contain any wool or hair subject to a higher rate of duty than the class so specified, the whole bale or package shall be subject to the highest rate of duty chargeable on wool of the class subject to such higher rate of duty, and if any bale or package be claimed by the importer to be shoddy, mungo, flocks, wool, hair, or other material of any class specified in this act, and such bale contain any admixture of any one or more of said materials, or of any other material, the whole bale or package shall be subject to duty at the highest rate imposed upon any article in said bale or package.

The words in italic are the so-called "skirting" clause, which includes the sorting of scoured wools.

3. The ruinous effect of the "skirting" clause, operating also to permit the import of sorted scoured wools without additional duty on account of the sorting or skirting, practically reduced the wool duty of 11 cents per pound down to a mere nominal amount, and in part defeated the provision for giving treble duty on scoured wools. It should be omitted from a new wool-tariff law.

This fatal "Provided," excepting "skirted" wools and scoured "sorted" wools from the prohibitions against frauds, was incorporated at the instance of some of those desiring wools imported in a shape to secure a great advantage over American wools. The skirting, in practice, removed so much of the fleece as to result not only in "skirting," but in "sorting" also.

The effect was that Australian "skirted" merino of no better quality than, and with a fiber not as good as, our American wools would command in our markets all of 2 cents per pound more than American whole fleeces of the same shrinkage in scouring. The skirting had three effects to increase the selling price of Australian merino:

(1) The effect of securing the most valuable light shrinkage part of the fleece in practical effect not only "skirted," but "sorted" also.

(2) To save the labor and consequent expense of "sorting"; and

(3) To admit sorted scoured wools of all classes without an increase of duty.

* * * * * * *

It was in view of these conditions—the light shrinkage of Australian merino and the "skirting" clause—that at the meeting of the National Woolgrowers' Association at Chicago, October 5, 1893, Hon. John T. Rich, governor of Michigan, in an able address, said:

"The effect * * * is to let in [Australian unwashed merino] wool, worth quite as much as Ohio washed fleece, at a duty of only 11 cents per pound, when, if it came in whole fleeces, washed, it would pay 22 cents per pound.

"So that on fine wool there is little, if any, more than one-half the protection provided [intended] by law. Another thing which helps to wipe out a portion of this is the fact that in Australia much larger flocks are kept, and it is much easier to get a large amount of uniform quality, and as the wool is skirted the manufacturers buy only such wool as they need. I have myself seen in Philadelphia invoices of this grease wool free from any hay seed or other vegetable matter, uniform in quality, with no twine, and which paid only 11 cents per pound duty and which was sold at from 40 to 42 cents when the best unwashed [American] full-blood merino wool would bring 18 to 20 cents.

In brief, the result is that under the McKinley Act of 1890 (a result not foreseen by Congress or by woolgrowers) Australian merino unwashed and "skirted," shrinking in scouring less than Ohio washed merino, was admitted at 11 cents duty, when the law was intended to give 22 cents on such wools.

TABLE SHOWING AMOUNTS OF FIRST, SECOND, AND THIRD CLASS WOOLS IMPORTED FOR THREE YEARS.

1. The imports of third-class wools and the aggregate of first and second class entered for consumption in the United States were for specified fiscal years as follows:

Year.	Quantities, third class.	Value.	Duties.	Total of first and second class.
	Pounds.			Pounds.
1892	90,560,125.25	$8,742,454.00	$2,885,012.26	44,062,211
1893	133,197,581	10,312,237.00	3,389,646.54	42,438,460
1895*	144,488,265	13,135,901.75		121,237,612
Total	368,245,971.25	32,190,592.75		207,738,283

* For 1895, total imports.

2. Thus in the three years specified the third-class wools aggregated 368,245,971.25 pounds, and the first and second classes combined only 207,738,283 pounds.

Most of these third-class wools came in for the manufacture of clothing, supplanting American merino and long wools of the mutton breeds.

In view of all these considerations this memorial respectfully asks that all imported wools shall be subjected to specific duties.

IMPORTS OF CHINA WOOL.

Prior to 1869 there were no imports of China wools. Since then imports have gradually increased, as indicated by specified fiscal years, as follows:

Year.	Quantity.	Value.	Import price per pound.
	Pounds.		Cents.
1870	9,016	$1,312	10.45
1880	66,751	9,188	13.76
1890	8,587,575	814,264	9.48
1893	20,753,893	1,812,250	8.74
1894	10,186,264	818,157	8.03
1895	26,089,418	1,699,414	5.15

Yet this wool, at an import price of 5.15 cents per pound, is of lighter shrinkage than the average American shropshire and other coarse wools. American woolgrowers can not endure Chinese competition.

M'KINLEY RATES ON WOOL.

On class 1 wools.—Merino, etc., unwashed, 11 cents per pound; merino washed, double duty; merino scoured, treble duty.

On class 2 wools.—Down and other long wools, washed or unwashed, 12 cents per pound; scoured, treble duty.

On class 3 wools.—Native coarse sheep, if of the value of 13 cents or less per pound, 32 per cent ad valorem; if the value exceed 13 cents, duty 50 per cent ad valorem.

NOTE.—The Dingley bill proposes to reenact the ad valorem duty on third-class wools.

The following table gives a comparison between the prices in Boston of fine Ohio fleece, scoured, and of Australian average fleece, scoured, in London:

Comparison of prices of Ohio and Australian scoured wools.

Year.	Price of fine Ohio fleece, scoured.	Price in London of Australian average fleece, scoured.	Difference of the two prices.

March 1, 1894	.45½	.32	.13½

Average difference, 29 cents.

This shows a decline from 73½ cents in 1890 to 45½ cents in 1894.

NOTE.—The McKinley law went into effect October 1, 1891, and was repealed August 15, 1894.

Mr. President, in closing this subject I wish to be understood as criticising no interest and no section. My objection is against the inequalities of the bill in question, and not against any industry.

I have no sympathy whatever with that sentiment which seeks to array one section of our country against the other. In common with every loyal American I look with pride upon the magnificent strides, in every branch of manufacturing industry, which have been made in the past thirty years. I regard this phenomenal progress as a splendid tribute to the Republican system of protection. It is this system which has stimulated and called into full play the astonishing inventive genius of our people, and which, in this respect, has made us the wonder and the admiration of the world. I am a believer in the principle of protection because it gives the work of this Republic to our own workingmen, to whom of right it belongs. Employment is essential to the well-being and happiness of the people. It brings prosperity and content and inspires patriotism. Idleness, upon the other hand, is prolific of discontent and social disorders of every character. I am therefore in favor of that policy which will light the fires in our own furnaces, start the wheels in our own factories, furnish labor for our people, develop our own magnificent resources, furnish a home market for our own products, and which will come nearest to making us a self-sustaining, independent nation in every particular. The protective principle, wisely and justly applied, will aid greatly in bringing about these desirable ends. But it ought never to be invoked for the benefit of any special interest, class, or section, or be permitted to foster any monopoly or combination against the public interest. It must protect the woolgrower as well as the wool manufacturer, the producer of raw materials as well as the producer of the finished product. In short, it must be as broad as the Union itself, and must be adjusted to guard every American industry which needs its sheltering arm to shield it from the cheap and degrading competition of other lands.

But, while I am an ardent advocate in the principle of protection, I am also a firm believer in the principle of true bimetallism, which I construe to mean the unlimited coinage of gold and silver upon equal terms and at a ratio to be fixed by law. My preference being for a ratio of 16 to 1, because in the light of history and all experience I believe that to be the natural and just ratio. I am in favor of the adoption of this policy independently by the United States, believing it to be a sound policy and in the interest of the great mass of the people, and that as a nation we are great enough, rich enough, and strong enough to establish and maintain our own financial policy, just as we maintain a tariff policy and a political policy without asking or waiting for the consent of any other nation of the world.

The recent enormous advance made in the industrial development of Japan, and which is now spreading to China, has demonstrated to reflecting men who have given the subject thoughtful consideration, that a protective tariff will no longer alone successfully guard our manufacturers and wage earners from the stream of cheap manufactured products which has begun to flow from those countries to our shores, and which is at last exciting the serious alarm of great numbers of our citizens engaged in the manufacturing industries. This is evidenced by the fact that boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and other organizations are appointing committees to investigate the nature, character, and extent of this Asiatic industrial invasion.

There are those who affect to believe that the industrial situation in Japan involves no serious menace to the labor and industries of this nation. Those who take this position are foolishly and fatuously blind to the real conditions. The Japanese nation numbers 40,000,000 of people, who, in point of skill and ingenuity, and in the power of adaptability and imitation, have no superiors among any of the nations. It is stated on good authority that a Japanese workman can make anything he has ever seen, and that his ingenuity is such that he can reproduce and put in operation without instruction the most difficult and complicated modern machinery of every character. It is this astonishing faculty which enables the Japanese to avail themselves of all the latest inventions of this and other countries, and it is this marvelous power of imitation and adaptation which has not only enabled them in a few short years to become a dangerous rival of our own at this moment, but is destined in a very short time to place Japan among the great manufacturing nations of the world.

But, Mr. President, it is not Japan alone that our manufacturers and wage earners now have cause to fear. Back of Japan is the Empire of China with its 400,000,000 of population. The recent war with Japan has brought about a remarkable change in the conditions existing in the more accessible portions of that vast domain. The rude shock of battle has aroused it from the dormant state in which it has lain for centuries. Her overwhelming defeat and the laws of conquest have compelled China to open up many of her ports to the introduction of modern machinery. Railroads and telegraphs and other great civilizing and modernizing influences are also performing their part in the general awakening process, and soon we are likely to see this giant of the Orient, until now unconscious of its strength and opportunities, shaking from its limbs the shackles of tradition and superstition which have enchained it for ages, and emulating the example and following in the footsteps of its successful rival and neighbor, Japan, entering as an active and terrible competitor in the race for the commercial and industrial supremacy of the world.

The Chinese Empire possesses in great abundance and variety every natural resource necessary to make her a great producing and manufacturing nation. Her soil and climate and her immense territory are such as to enable her to produce enormous supplies of cotton and wool, as well as other raw material. Her people are equal to the Japanese in respect to industry and in their imitative and adaptative faculty, and superior to them in respect to their powers of application and endurance. Wages in Japan are ridiculously low as compared with American and European standards, but in China wages are even lower than in Japan. As a fact of much importance I may here state that Japanese manufacturers are even now building cotton factories in China, because they can there get cheaper labor.

As bearing upon this subject, Mr. President, I have taken from consular and other reports tables relating to the industrial growth of Japan as well as to the rate of wages paid and other matters relating to Asiatic competition. I ask permission to print them with my remarks. I wish also to add that the industrial wage workers of the United States may wisely and profitably study these significant statistics.

The following tables are taken from an article written by Mr. W. E. Curtis upon "The industrial revolution in Japan," and published in a bulletin issued by the Department of Labor in January, 1896:

The Japanese coinage is based on the decimal system and corresponds with that of the United States. A rin was originally the same as a mill. Ten rin make 1 sen and 100 sen make 1 yen, which used to be as good as a gold American dollar, but is now worth about 51 cents. Therefore, a man who goes to Japan from the United States or Europe with money that is at par with gold finds his funds almost doubled immediately.

Factory labor is paid even less than these prices. Middleton & Co., one of the most prominent tea-shipping houses in Japan, employ in their establishment a large number of persons, men and women, who work from 5 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock at night, with three intervals at 8, 12, and 3 o'clock, respectively, when they eat their rice and what other refreshments they bring with them and rest for twenty minutes or a half hour. The highest wages paid by the Messrs. Middleton are 42 sen a day, which is equivalent to 21 cents in United States currency This is received by men who are experts in handling tea, and have acquired their proficiency by natural ability and long years of experience.

The lowest wages are paid to young boys and girls who pick over the tea leaves to remove the stems and other foreign substances. They receive 13 sen (6½ cents) a day for about twelve hours' work, not including their resting spells.

Of the entire force in the establishment 20 are paid 21 cents (United States currency) a day, 90 are paid 18 cents, 50 are paid 15 cents, 335 are paid 12 cents, 278 are paid 10 cents, 5 are paid 9 cents, and 30 are paid 6½ cents—and they board themselves.

Mr. President, there can be but little doubt in the mind of any unprejudiced student of the industrial development of India, Japan, and China, and of the remarkable progress which these countries have made in the past twenty years and are still making, that these changes are mainly due to the demonetization of silver by Europe and the United States and the consequent appreciation in the purchasing power of gold. An examination of the record shows that when, after silver's demonetization, silver bullion began to fall in value, the price of wheat and cotton began to fall in sympathy. It also shows that as these staples began to fall in price the exports of wheat and cotton from India and other silver-using countries to Great Britain began to increase in volume, and that for twenty years these reciprocal operations have continued with a sufficient degree of regularity and uniformity to satisfy the most skeptical mind that there must be some related cause which has produced such continuous and uniform results. In the light of experience and of the facts contained in the records, it is not, it seems to me, difficult to explain the process by which these results have been brought about. It is a fact that Great Britain during these years has been the chief purchaser of silver bullion and also the chief importer and consumer of wheat and cotton.

It is also a fact that for a great many years an ounce of silver in Liverpool has generally exchanged about evenly for a bushel of wheat; therefore the price of wheat in Liverpool would generally be the cost of an ounce of silver bullion plus the amount of freight on a bushel of wheat from India to Liverpool. Thus it will be readily understood that the lower the price of an ounce of silver bullion the lower will be the price of a bushel of wheat, and what is true of wheat is also true of cotton, the other great export staple of this country. Then if we bear steadily in mind the fact that silver has substantially the same purchasing power to-day in India and other silver-using countries with reference to the commodities of those countries, including labor, that it had twenty years ago, it becomes apparent at once how the demonetization of silver and the resultant fall in the price of silver bullion has operated to lower the price of wheat and cotton. The natural and logical effect of this condition of affairs was to artificially stimulate the growing of wheat and cotton in India and to cheapen its price in the Liverpool market, and the inevitable result has been to bring ruin to the agricultural interests of Great Britain and to render wheat and cotton growing in the United States a profitless undertaking. The folly of this policy is magnified when we reflect that we have been the great producers of silver, as well as of wheat and cotton, and that by degrading and discrediting one of our own great products (silver) we deliberately placed in the hands of our chief commercial and manufacturing competitor a club with which to strike down the wheat and cotton producers of our own country.

I have referred to wheat and cotton because they were the first of our products to feel the blighting effects of the competition with silver-using countries. The second effect of the cheapening of silver, operating in precisely the same manner as it did in respect to wheat and cotton, has been to artificially stimulate the development of manufacturing industries (so far chiefly in the line of textile fabrics), first in India, then in Japan, and now in China. The cry of the British farmer which went up when he found himself being crushed by the cheap competition of India was scarcely heard; but when the Lancashire cotton spinners found that the cotton factories at Bombay and Calcutta, with their cheap labor, paid in cheaply bought silver, had monopolized their business, they sent up a wail of anguish that attracted the attention of English statesmen, and which resulted in the inauguration of a bimetallic movement which has enlisted the support of the ablest public men in that country.

The same thing has happened in the United States. So long as the farmers were the chief sufferers but little attention was given to their cry of distress. But the situation has changed. The wall of protection erected by the Republican party around the manufacturing industries of this country served for a long time to shield them and the men employed in them from this cheap competition. But that wall was broken down by the Wilson tariff act, and this fact, taken in connection with the phenomenal industrial advance which Japan has made within the last two or three years, has opened the eyes of a large and growing number of manufacturers and of the industrial wage earners of this country, and they begin at last to realize that a protective tariff alone can no longer protect them. They are beginning at last to grasp the great fundamental fact underlying the demand for the restoration of silver and to understand that just so long as silver retains its present purchasing power over labor and commodities in Asiatic countries just so long will the Chinese and Japanese manufacturer be able to bring their wares to our markets, sell them for gold, buy the bullion equivalent of 2 silver dollars with each gold dollar, and go back to China and Japan and repeat the process. A protective tariff might equalize the conditions arising from the difference in the standards of living and the rates of wages, but no attainable tariff can possibly equalize the enormous advantage which these silver-standard countries now enjoy through being able to buy from us the material (silver) out of which their money is made at one-half of its real purchasing value to them.

In the light of these significant facts, it must be apparent to the industrial wage earners of the United States that unless this difference in the money standards existing between gold and silver using countries can be equalized one of two results must ultimately follow. Either the wages and standards of living of the Japanese and Chinese must be raised to our level or else our wages and standards of living must be reduced to theirs. When looked at from this standpoint it is not difficult to say what the result must inevitably be.

Mr. President, I here offer and ask permission to print with my remarks an excerpt from the prize essay on bimetallism written by Mr. George Jamison, esq., British consul-general at Shanghai, China. I have read nothing which states so forcibly and brings out in such clear light the danger of the industrial situation in China and Japan as it relates to British manufacturing interests. His showing appeals with still greater force to the United States because of our geographical location and the fact that as a rule the American industrial wage earner has been better paid than his English brother:

Let us consider, firstly, the effects when the gold price falls and, by consequence, the silver price is steady.

Suppose two cotton mills working, the one in England and the other in Japan or China, and competing with one another for the sale of their productions, and contrast the position of the two in 1873 and in 1893. Let us assume that in 1873 they were competing on even terms—that is, that each realized to the owners the same profit. In 1894 each employs the same amount of labor as it did in 1873, which the English pays for in gold at the old rates and the Japanese in silver, also at the old rates. The Japanese mill owner still pays his men, as he used to, 18 to 20 cents a day, and his women 8 to 10 cents a day. In 1873 that meant 9 pence to 10 pence per day for men, and 4 pence to 5 pence for women. Now it means just one-half—that is, 4 pence to 5 pence and 2 pence to 2½ pence. Multiply this over 2,000 mill hands and see what the saving will be on labor alone. But this is not all. The same advantage accrues on the coal bill. Japanese coals cost them, say, $4 to $5 a ton, which meant 16 shilling to 20 shillings. They still can be got at $4 to $5 a ton, but that now only means 8 shillings to 10 shillings. The same thing applies to rent, wages, taxes, and all fixed charges whatsoever. They are all payable in silver, and have nowise varied with the rise in gold. Only in the single item of raw material is the old equality maintained. Both are free to buy that wherever they can find it cheapest on the world's market, the only advantage being proximity to the best source of supply and, consequently, economy of transport.

Now, so long as the gold price went on falling and the silver price consequently kept steady there was no great manifest advantage resulting to the Japanese manufacturer from a fall in exchange. He continued to get the same prices for his products, and his outlay was the same year by year, both being in silver. Any improvement he could effect by economy of management or by getting his raw material cheaper would be so much extra profit, otherwise his position was unaffected. In any case exchange fluctuations would not trouble him.

The English manufacturer, on the other hand, has to meet the same fixed expenditure from ever-decreasing returns. He is able to buy his raw material cheaper, owing to the general fall in commodities, but his wages bill, his rent, his interest on borrowed capital, his rates and taxes, have all to be met as before. His profits begin to dwindle; it is only by the greatest economy of management that he can keep open at all. The best mills only manage to pay a fair profit, the worst struggle to the verge of bankruptcy, always hoping for a turn of the tide, and finally are forced to close.

Suppose, in the second place, that the silver price rises and, as a consequence, the gold price remains steady.

The gold manufacturer is, for the time being, in an easier position, his returns do not fall off, and, though his expenses are the same, he is in a position to profit by any economy of manufacture or management.

But the silver manufacturer is, so to speak, in clover. All his working expenses are on the old scale, and he is thus a clear gainer by the extra price he gets for his products. If silver prices have risen, say, 10 per cent, his profits will be increased by just 10 per cent on his turnover. The natural result of this will be to attract more capital, more mills will be built, and the output will increase. Competition will lower prices, and the gold manufacturer will again be driven into a corner.

Whatever happens, the manufacturer in the silver-standard country has a great advantage, and simply for this reason, that he can obtain his labor at half the cost, relatively to gold wages, which he formerly paid. And this advantage must remain to him (unless silver can in the meantime be brought back to something like its old value) until either wages in gold countries have fallen 50 per cent or till they have risen 100 per cent in silver-using countries, or till some common meeting ground has been found between the two. In other words, the old equilibrium will not be restored until the standard of living and comfort among the working classes in England has greatly fallen, or till the standard in silver-using countries has greatly risen.

Mr. President, in concluding this subject I desire to express it as my honest conviction that the unfortunate condition in which our farmers, our wage earners, and our manufacturers now find themselves is largely the result of twenty years of constantly falling prices; that this steady and continual fall in prices is directly traceable to the fall in the value of silver as measured in gold, and that this fall in the value of silver has in turn operated as a powerful stimulus to silver-using countries, first, to enormously increase their production of wheat and cotton, with which they supply the market our own farmers formerly enjoyed; and second, to bring into existence great manufacturing enterprises which are utilizing their inexhaustible supply of cheap labor in the production of goods that are coming into practically unrestricted competition with our own. And it is because I am convinced that the present distressful conditions have been brought about largely by these causes that I am in favor of uniting the policies of bimetallism and protection. I believe that these two policies are allied in principle; that they are logically connected, and that the effect of each if put into operation will be to check the importation of the products of Asiatic and European labor, which are now so disastrously affecting all our interests. There is no argument which can be made in support of the protective system which can not be applied quite as consistently and with equal force in support of the policy of bimetallism, and for the reason that the natural and logical effect of each of these policies is to destroy the great advantage which foreign producers now hold over us because of their cheaper labor, their cheaper money, and their lower standards of living.

In view of the harsh criticisms which are being so freely indulged against the silver Republicans upon this floor, it may not be out of place for me to call attention to the fact that the Republican party in this Chamber has been powerless in the past, as I believe it will be for years in the future, to carry out its protective policy without the aid of the votes of the Senators from the silver States. It was these votes that enabled the Republicans to pass the McKinley law in 1890. They gave their support to that measure in return for the Sherman law. It was a reciprocal arrangement, a mutual recognition, so to speak, of protective tariff and of silver, but no sooner had President Cleveland called Congress together in extra session, for the purpose of repealing the Sherman law, than a large number of the Republicans of this body, turning a deaf ear to the justly indignant protests of the silver Republicans who had stood by them in the struggle for protection, and permitting themselves to be stampeded by the false cry that the Sherman law was the cause of the panic, proceeded to repudiate their own party platform and party pledges and to help repeal a law which they had themselves proposed and enacted, and which it would seem in common fairness they were obligated to uphold. And all this was done upon the demand and at the request of an Administration whose stubborn determination to force upon the country its pet policy of free trade and the gold standard was chiefly responsible for the industrial and business paralysis which prevailed and for which it then sought to make the Sherman law the scapegoat.

The silver Republicans can not be blamed if they are disposed to regard this action upon the part of their Republican colleagues not only as a surrender of a Republican principle, but as a betrayal of their confidence as well. Under these circumstances the Republican silver Senators, had they so desired, would have been quite as fully justified in aiding Democrats to repeal the McKinley law as were their Republican colleagues in joining a Democratic Administration in securing the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law.

There is probably no section of our country that derives so little direct benefit from the protective system as the silver States. They are producers solely of what are called "raw materials" and purchasers of finished products. They are also large and increasing producers of gold, and as gold is constantly appreciating in purchasing power, it may be openly questioned whether they would not be the greatest gainers by a policy which would permit them to buy their manufactured commodities in the open markets of the world, unrestricted by tariff or other legislation. But up to this time the Republicans of those States have not permitted themselves to be swayed by selfish considerations in the discussion of the tariff question. They have always taken the broad ground that the protective system was correct in principle, and that it meant the greatest good to the greatest number. But with the policy of protection they have also united the policy of bimetallism, believing that that, too, was a cardinal principle of Republican faith. Upon this platform of protection and bimetallism they have won their political battles in the past and held their States in the Republican column.

They believe that protection and bimetallism are fundamental principles of Republican policy, and in common with a vast number of Republicans in every section of the country they have witnessed with disappointment and chagrin the total abandonment of one of these principles by their fellow-Republicans in Congress, and that, too, in defiance of the last official utterance of the party upon that subject.

It was upon the platform of "protection and bimetallism, not one, but both," that I was elected and sent here, and I regard it as my solemn duty to cast my vote in whatever direction, in my judgment, gives promise of securing the adoption of these policies.

Mr. President, the weakest and I think I may add the most contemptible of all the arguments against bimetallism, and at the same time one most frequently used, is that which falsely asserts that the only ones who would be benefited by the restoration of silver are the people engaged in the silver-mining industry, and which attributes to the wholly insignificant number of men engaged in silver mining the responsibility for the great movement in behalf of bimetallism which extends all over Europe as well as the United States, and which to-day comprises among its advocates many of the greatest statesmen and political economists of the age. Such an argument is dishonest and demagogic, because it ignores alike our own experience and the truth of history, and because it cunningly seeks to evade the real fact, which is, that an overwhelming majority of those who urge the restoration of silver have no interest whatever, directly or indirectly, in the silver-mining industry. It is an argument craftily designed, and intended as an appeal to prejudice rather than to reason, and which attempts upon false premises to array public sentiment against a class of worthy citizens engaged in a lawful enterprise. The men who first went out and discovered and developed the silver mines of the West did so under the authority and encouragement of laws which fully recognized silver as money, and which had been in force from the very inception of the Government. They believed, as many yet believe, that the Constitution itself contained a guaranty that silver was always to be a full standard money of this country. They were unjustly deprived of the fruits of their labor and enterprise by the passage of laws which destroyed the value of their product and which rendered many of their investments utterly worthless. And if it now be said that these people are selfish in wishing to restore the old laws and their prosperity, then I reply it is simply the kind of selfishness which can be found in Massachusetts as well as in Montana, in Connecticut as well as in Colorado, in New Hampshire as well as in Nevada. It is that common selfishness which animates humanity everywhere, in the East as well as in the West, and which springs naturally from the instinct of self-preservation. It is the manifestation of a natural law which has ever been and ever will be a most potent factor in shaping human progress.

It is also charged against the men engaged in the silver-mining industry that they want the Government to give them $1.29 an ounce for their silver bullion; but that is not true. They ask nothing of the kind. They believe that the opening of the mints of the United States to its free and unlimited coinage will restore silver to a parity with gold, and so believing, and in proof of their faith they have always stood ready, as they now do, to accept a free silver-coinage law which will give all the seigniorage—in other words, all the difference between the coining and the market value of silver—to the Government. Such a law would render it impossible for other countries to unload their silver upon us, as many seem to fear would be the result of a free-coinage measure.

Mr. President, I have already said that I have no sympathy whatever with any attempt to array one section of this nation against another, either upon the financial or any other question. That policy has produced nothing but evil in the past, and in the light of experience, no citizen who truly loves his country will attempt to foster or encourage such a sentiment in the future. So far as the people of the silver States are concerned, I have no hesitation in saying that they will be found among the very first to repudiate and condemn any attempt to array them upon sectional lines, no matter what issues may be involved. An intense national pride is their chief characteristic, and nowhere in this broad land does the sight of our country's flag inspire greater enthusiasm or compel more profound respect. And in this connection I may also add that from no portion of this Union has there been heard a more prompt, unanimous, or enthusiastic response to the patriotic chord which recent events have stirred in the hearts of the American people. Their patriotism is untainted by that sordid spirit which of late has been so conspicuous in the great financial centers of the land, and which, if it could have its way, would subordinate the very honor and dignity and future of the nation to the cold-blooded greed and avarice of manipulators and dealers in stocks and bonds.

The records of Congress will show that the votes of the silver States have invariably been cast upon broad national lines—for battle ships and coast defenses to guard our great cities on the seaboard; for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and for every measure designed to foster, to protect, and to facilitate the trade and commerce of the whole country or to add in any way to the nation's security and strength. And they have done this because they have ever been and are now profoundly conscious of the fact that although we live thousands of miles apart, although we may differ upon financial and other policies, although we may disagree as to the meaning of party platforms, we are nevertheless at the same time citizens of a common country, having a common ancestry and a common destiny.

In conclusion, I hope that the resolution of my colleague to recommit the Dingley bill to the Committee on Finance will be taken up and passed, and that the bill will then be returned to the Senate in the form of a just and equitable Republican measure, based upon recognized principles of protective tariff legislation, and accompanied by a provision for the reestablishment of bimetallism. To such a bill Republican Senators can consistently and logically give their hearty indorsement and support, conscious that in so doing they are standing squarely upon Republican ground, and making an honest and sincere effort to redeem Republican pledges.

Mr. President, during all its long and splendid career, I believe there never has before been a time in the history of the Republican party when it failed to correctly estimate the necessities of the hour, or refused to respond to the just requirements of the masses of the people. At this moment, however, it seems to be wavering upon this financial question and to have been partly driven from its course by the intolerant, interested, and noisy clamor of a press largely owned and controlled by a comparatively small, but rich and powerful, class—a class that knows no party and no political creed, but which seeks by every means at its command to dominate and control all parties in its own special interest. The Republican party in the past has justly claimed to be the party of the people. It had its inception in the sacred cause of human liberty. In its time it has successfully met and solved many grave and vexed problems of government, and has made for itself a record that commands the respect and admiration of all mankind. If it should perish to-morrow, in my humble opinion it would still go down into history as the best and bravest political party the world has ever known. Bearing in mind its past grand achievements, and remembering the liberal spirit and love of justice which has ever characterized its action, I still have faith to hope and believe that when the time comes it will yet refuse to be guided in its future policy by the dictates of selfishness and greed; that it will refuse to be placed in the attitude of being the representative of the great corporate and moneyed interests of the country; that it will remember that this is still a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, and that when it meets in national convention it will put forth a platform and a candidate that shall give assurance of a just regard for the happiness and welfare of the toilers and producers of the land. If it shall do this its next victory will not be the mere passing expression of a universal discontent to be followed again by a humiliating defeat, but it will be the glad harbinger of another period of Republican supremacy whose beneficent rule shall outrival in splendor the glory of its magnificent past. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words upon one or two matters to which the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE] referred. I wish to correct what is apparently a misapprehension upon the part of the distinguished Senator, who has just made a very able speech. He spoke at some length of the woolen question. I wish to read to him just a few figures.

For the seven months of the current fiscal year, that is, from the 1st of last July to the end of last January, the imports of woolen manufactures, not including carpets and some minor classes, aggregated $38,206,376. In the corresponding seven months of the previous fiscal year they were $17,500,000, an increase of $21,000,000 in the imports of woolen goods. Why? The trade journals of Great Britain will show the Senator the exultation there—I do not blame them—over the enormously increased production of woolen goods in Great Britain; and the same might be said of Belgium and some woolen centers of France.

On the other hand, I could show the Senator something from my own county which is illustrative in the same line. I have received a letter—not a whining one, for our people can bear adverse conditions—in which a woolen manufacturer says that of his 120 looms 30 are idle, and that the town, which contains a very considerable population, almost wholly devoted to woolen manufactures, is running on reduced wages and five days in the week. Of the $21,000,000 increase in the imports of woolen manufactures probable five-sixths were before that manufactured in the United States. In short, with the new act a cyclone struck us in many towns and many communities in New England.

Now, one other matter and I shall be through, although the temptation is strong to continue the discussion. I do not call to mind a single New England Senator who ever moved to take off the duty on wool or who ever voted against a duty. I do not remember one. One sits by me here, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I know my colleague [Mr. PLATT] did not. I know the distinguished and venerable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] did not vote to bring in wool free of duty. We have not played false. The friends of protection in New England have not played a double game on our friends of the West. We understand perfectly well their local interest in the production of wool, and we understand perfectly that whatever prospers one section of the country affects every section. We are as broad as the nation in our protective policy, and we shall try to show it hereafter.

Mr. MANTLE. There is no difference of opinion between the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and myself on that point. I am not charging anything of the sort. What I said was directed at the bill in question. I say it is unequal, inequitable, unjust, and therefore an un-Republican measure.

I do not dispute the facts which the Senator from Connecticut states; I doubt not that there is suffering, as he says; that the mills are idle, and all that, but what I say is that if a measure is to be passed here it should be a fair one, treating all sections, all interests, and all classes alike.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator from Montana sits down, if he will allow me, I think he said a little more than that. I think he implied that he and those who agree with him might well be justified in suspecting that the Eastern manufacturers and their representatives, if the bill which came from the House of Representatives at the present session had passed, would have been perfectly willing to have left them in the lurch, having got sufficient protection for their own manufactures.

I wish to remind my honorable friend, in the line of what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has just said, that he can not find a New England Senator who ever failed to stand by protection on wool through thick and thin. On the other hand, Oregon has sent a free-wool Senator here; Kansas has sent a free-wool Senator here; Texas has sent two free-wool Senators here; Ohio has sent three or four free-wool Senators here. There have been almost enough free-wool Senators from the wool-producing States voting for free wool to vote down the entire New England delegation voting for protection.

Mr. MANTLE. I think that is all true. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that they have supported those measures. At the same time they have supported the Dingley bill, which is an unjust measure and which discriminates against the woolgrowers of the country in favor of the woolen manufacturers. But that is not the whole ground of my opposition to the Dingley bill. It is not necessary to repeat my argument. I have just stated what my views are upon the protective tariff, upon the Dingley bill, and upon the question of bimetallism. I tried to make myself plain, and I did not accuse the Senators from New England of ever having opposed a tariff upon wool. I do, however, believe that the manufacturers, the woolen manufacturers and the carpet manufacturers, of the country are really opposed to a fair tariff upon wool. I have some letters here from Judge Lawrence bearing particularly upon that question, in which he gives a correspondence with woolen manufacturers. He asked them to give their support in favor of a just tariff upon wool, and they wrote back and told him that the time had not yet arrived when that effort should be made. At the same time they are willing to accept the full McKinley rates, as I have shown, in many instances on their own product, upon their own industry.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I wish to add a little to the truth of history, something that has not been said in this debate by any one of the gentlemen who have occupied the floor. It has been intimated by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that the woolen manufacturers have suffered loss by the introduction into the country of cheaper woolen goods and cheaper wool. The fact is, and the official statistics show it, that there has been a much larger introduction of wool into the country than has ever taken place under any protective tariff. The fact is still further shown that every pound of that wool has been manufactured by American labor and has found a market. The fact is still further shown that the people of the United States have gotten their woolen goods that were imported nearly 50 per cent cheaper than they got them under the tariff that was repealed. The fact still further appears that the Government has got more revenue from the woolen goods than it has ever received under the protective tariff. The fact still further appears that wool instead of going down in price has turned back again, and the protective tariff has never added one solitary cent to the price of domestic wool in the United States. Now, my friend stated a while ago that wool had continued to fall.

Mr. HOAR. Will my friend allow me to add one fact to his list? And the fact still further appears that woolen manufacturers are failing, that the woolgrowing is stopped, and that the Government finds itself with a diminished revenue, and we have increased bankruptcy.

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; nothing of the sort. Mr. President, the woolen manufacturers are going nearer to the sheep. Some of them, perhaps, are going down in New England, but they are going nearer to where their raw material is. Woolen manufacturing is springing up in one part of the country and perhaps dying away in the other, but the fact remains that with nearly 200,000,000 pounds more wool imported into the country every single, solitary fiber of it has been manufactured by American labor, and it has given additional employment to nearly 100,000 more laborers than it hitherto did under the protective tariff.

Mr. President, a protective tariff is a protective humbug, and it has proven to be so through our whole history.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator from Texas a question?

Mr. MILLS. Several of them.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the Senator from Texas if it is not a fact that since the Wilson bill went into operation there has been a vast decrease in the number of sheep in Texas; and if so, how does he account for it, if he can account for it?

Mr. MILLS. I do not believe there has been a vast decrease of sheep in Texas.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The official records of the comptroller (I believe that is the name of the State official of Texas, perhaps it is auditor) show that there has been an immense decrease in the number of sheep in Texas in that time.

Mr. MILLS. The statistics are made by sheep men under the delusion that a protective tariff on wool is some benefit to them. It has been proven in the whole history of the wool tariff that wool was at a higher price in 1859 and 1860, when it was comparatively free, than it has ever been since, and it has been falling year by year from 1860 to the present time.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I do not know whether the officials in Texas are sheep men or not.

Mr. MILLS. I do not know who gathers the official statistics. I find that in the agricultural reports made up by some of these people they make a reduction in the number of sheep, but there has been no reduction in the price of wool since the last tariff was made, and you can not say that there has been. Then, if there was no reduction in the price of wool, what was the tariff upon wool for? It did not add anything to it. It added compensation to the manufacturer of wool, and compensation for a tax that he never paid.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Democratic party had passed a free tariff bill, so far as wool was concerned, some years ago, and the election of a Democratic President had discounted the whole business before the Wilson bill went into operation.

Mr. MILLS. Somebody discounted you in 1892. Who did that?

Mr. BUTLER. This is a sham battle even before the campaign commences. I ask that Senate bill 2567 be laid before the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5161) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 249) granting a pension to Charles E. Jones;

A bill (S. 626) providing for disposals of lands on abandoned portions of the Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in Montana, and for the relief of certain settlers thereon;

A bill (H. R. 1141) granting a pension to Miss Mary A. Hull, dependent sister of John A. Hull, deceased, late of Company F, Eighty-first Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the late war of the rebellion;

A bill (H. R. 4053) repealing chapter 148 of the Supplement of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 5083) granting an increase of pension to A. H. McLaws; and

A bill (H. R. 6644) granting a pension to Gen. John M. Thayer, United States Volunteers.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE SYSTEM.

Mr. BUTLER. I now call up Senate bill 2567.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2567) to establish a postal-telegraph system and to enlarge the postal facilities of the people of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. I send to the desk an amendment which I wish to have read and printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amend section 3 by striking out all of the remainder of the section after the word "service," in line 17, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall establish a telephone instead of a telegraph instrument in every post-office at which, in his judgment, a telephone can render sufficient service, and effect a saving of expense to the Department. Whereas long-distance messages may be sent from or destined for a post-office at which a telephone is used, the Postmaster-General shall prescribe regulations designating the post-office using telegraph instruments to which the telephone messages in any case may be sent to be forwarded by telegraph."

Amend the title of the bill to read as follows: "A bill to establish a postal telegraph and telephone system, and to enlarge the postal facilities of the people of the United States."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to extend, improve, modernize, and bring up to date the postal service of the United States. It directs and empowers the Postmaster-General to utilize all of the most effective agencies for the transmission of intelligence. No one will question that this bill, providing for the use of the telegraph and telephone by the Post-Office Department, will have that effect.

Bills similar to this one have been before nearly every Congress since 1866. In all more than 70 bills have been introduced to provide for equipping the postal service with the modern facilities of electric mails by the use of the telephone and the telegraph. Committees of the House and the Senate have made 18 reports on these various bills. Of these 18 reports only 2 have been adverse, while 16 of them have strongly favored the provisions of a postal telegraph. Of the 2 adverse reports, one was in 1869, and was based on the ground that the five years allotted to the telegraph companies had not expired. This was just and proper, however strongly the committee might have favored the principle of a postal telegraph. The other was a short report mildly disapproving of the bill, but not attempting to argue the matter or to give any substantial reasons against it.

The 16 reports favoring the bill are able and exhaustive. Even the most casual examination of the hearings before the committees and the conclusions of the committees thereon will convince any fair-minded man who may have any doubt as to the wisdom, constitutionality, or necessity of such a provision. These reports show beyond controversy that the present telegraph system is, first, imperfect and slow in the delivery of messages; second, that it is too expensive, not only because the offices are too distantly removed from the great bulk of the population, but because the rates are so high that citizens engaged in legitimate industries, or who wish to correspond immediately on social or personal matters, can not afford to pay the rates except in cases of the greatest emergency; third, that the telegraph companies make no effort to establish offices for the convenience of the people, but are guided solely by whether or not any particular office will pay a handsome dividend to the company; fourth, the present system builds up a monopoly that exacts large dividends from the people on watered and fictitious stock, thereby creating a number of millionaires, who, to protect the agencies of their ill-gotten gains, use their influence and money too often to corrupt legislation; fifth, that the postal system and the telegraph system would both be better and more effective if they were combined in one and operated at cost on the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number, instead of as a private monopoly for the greatest gain to the few selfish managers without regard to the interests of the public; sixth, that the present management is not only unsatisfactory, imperfect, and dangerous, but it is absolutely unconstitutional.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open to public entry all that part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask that the regular business may be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from North Carolina may conclude his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. I have just given a brief summary of what these 18 reports of Congressional committees on the postal telegraph show. I hold in my hand a statement by Prof. Frank Parsons, published in the Arena of January, February, March, and April, 1896, in which he condenses and analyzes these 18 reports. He quotes from them and edits them. I ask permission to have this condensed statement of the reports of these 18 Congressional committees printed as a document for the benefit of the Senate and the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in considering this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us examine the constitutional question first. I shall undertake to prove, not only by these Congressional reports, but also by the opinion of other able constitutional lawyers, by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and by the Constitution itself that this bill is constitutional, but further, that it is plainly and positively unconstitutional for Congress not to provide for the use of the telegraph and telephone as agencies of our postal system under the management of the Post-Office Department.

Section 8, Article I of the Constitution enumerates the powers of Congress. Among the powers expressly and specifically stated is the following:

The Congress shall have power to establish post-offices and post-roads.

That this is an exclusive power no one will question. It is so admitted and stated by even the extreme strict constructionists of the Constitution.

Senator John C. Calhoun, the leader of the strict constructionists, who denied to the General Government all power not clearly and expressly granted, in a report made by him as chairman of the committee of the United States Senate in 1836, said:

It must be borne in mind that the power of Congress over the post-offices and the mails is an exclusive power.

This power, as stated in the Constitution, is interpreted by the Supreme Court to mean the transmission of intelligence in any form and by any means. I call particular attention to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Pensacola vs. Telegraph Company (96 U. S., 1), in which it was held that the telegraph and telephone was within the grant of power to establish the post-offices. The opinion was delivered by Chief Justice Waite, and the court was unanimous in sustaining the same. I ask the Secretary to read an extract from the decision of the court. Here is an extract from a unanimous decision of the court declaring practically the present management unconstitutional by saying that it is constitutional and the duty of Congress to use the postal telegraph.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The powers thus granted are not confined to the instrumentality of the postal service known or in use when the Constitution was adopted, but they keep pace with the progress of the country, and adapt themselves to the new developments of time and circumstances. They extend from the horse with its rider to the stagecoach; from the sailing vessels to the steamboats; from the coach and steamboats to the railroads, and from the railroads to the telegraph, as these new agencies are successively brought into use to meet the demands of increasing population and wealth.

Mr. BUTLER. Thus we see by the plain language of the Constitution and the expressed decision of the Supreme Court thereon that the Federal Government is a constitutional agent of the people for the transmission of intelligence.

The Government is therefore bound to use the telephone and the telegraph and any and every other improved agency that can be found in the transmission of intelligence in the most speedy and effective manner.

I ask permission at this point to insert in my remarks a very able statement as to the duty of the Government as the agent of the people in the transmission of mails to use all the new and improved agencies, from Prof. Frank Parsons, as published in the January number of the Arena.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Chair hears no objection, and permission is granted.

The article referred to is as follows:

It is a well-settled principle of law and justice that an agent is bound to be loyal to the interests of his principal, bound to execute his trust in at least as enlightened and energetic a manner as he does his own business of a similar nature, bound to use modern methods and improvements of established value in the transaction of business of the sort that has been intrusted to him. An agent to build a house would not discharge his duty by building a log cabin in the style of olden times; he must avail himself of the architectural science of the day and build a good modern house just as if he were building for himself, or better. An agent who uses one method in his own affairs and an inferior method in similar affairs of his principal is clearly neglecting his duty, to put it as mildly as possible.

Clearly the Federal Government is the agent of the people for the transmission of intelligence; clearly it ought to adopt new and better methods of transportation as advancing civilization reveals them; clearly the superiority of the telegraph has long since been revealed; therefore, clearly it has been and is the duty of the Federal Government to utilize the telegraph and telephone in the carriage of the people's correspondence. To hold the contrary, to say that Congress is not bound to adopt new methods as they are discovered and proved to be superior, is to say that it would have done its duty by continuing to carry all the mails by foot and horse, refusing the aid of steam. Any rule that would relieve Congress of the duty of using electricity in the service of the nation would equally relieve it of the duty of using steam or even horsepower in their service, and any principle that establishes the duty of the Government to use the power of steam in the people's business establishes with still greater emphasis its duty to use the telegraph and telephone.

Mr. BUTLER. On this constitutional question I want to quote on this point from no less an authority than Henry Clay. As early as 1844 Henry Clay was advocating Government ownership of the telegraph and the use of it exclusively by the Post-Office Department. He wrote as follows:

It is quite manifest it is destined to exert great influence on the business affairs of society. In the hands of private individuals they will be able to monopolize intelligence and to perform the greatest operations in commerce and other departments of business. I think such an engine should be exclusively under the control of the Government.

Mr. PEFFER. What date did the Senator give?

Mr. BUTLER. That was in 1844. Right in this connection, too, I will call attention to what Hon. Cave Johnson, the Democratic Postmaster-General under James K. Polk, said, and that was a strict-constructionist Administration. Here is what he had to say with reference to the postal telegraph in 1846:

It becomes a question of great importance how far the Government will allow individuals to divide with it the business of transmittting intelligence—an important duty committed to it by the Constitution. * * * The use of an instrument so powerful for good or evil can not, with safety to the people, be left in the hands of private individuals.

I quote now from the Report of Postmaster-General Wanamaker in 1892. In commenting on the same he says:

Almost every succeeding Postmaster-General has pressed the same question upon Presidents and Congresses. For the fourth time I urge its consideration—not for revenue to the Department, but for the public good.

* * * * * * *

I am fully convinced that the Government will never properly do the postal work committed to it until it uses electricity in some form, and therefore I advocate the utilization of both the telegraph and the telephone at the earliest practicable day. To receive letters and other mail and store them away for shipment in bulk, more or less slowly, once a day or even every hour, when a wire and a telegraph instrument for the needed quick messages, or telephone, might connect the major part of the post-offices, seems an antiquated anomaly. It is true that a large part of the mails must always go by rail, but there is another considerable part that seeks quicker transit; that does not find convenient the 10,000 railroad-telegraph offices, often distant from villages; that does not find the telegraph tariff within the reach of working people. The mail and the telegraph are the life currents of business and, to a large degree, of social life, and the private monopoly of either system must result in creating a preferred class to whom high rates may not be objectionable. The humbler citizens must do without.

It was said long ago that the telegraph must be a monopoly, and so is the postal system; but the difference is that one is operated for private gain and the other for the public good. The Government follows a settler across the plains and into the mines, and establishes a post-office in order that his family may have letters and newspapers and be more content in a frontier home. The telegraph goes where it can find paying business only; and so it falls out that only a sixtieth part of the people of the United States, owing not to the need but to the inconvenience and the charges, employ the telegraph. The post-office helps to settle, serve, and satisfy the country—literally to make the country—and of all its adjuncts the most important, that which would afford the quickest mode of communication between families near and far, apparently can not be made available in any way.

The fact is that in some respects the telegraph seems to get farther and farther away as the capital and power of the great corporation increase. Many telegraph companies have been established from time to time, but to-day there are but two independent companies. All but one have been in some form identified with the one corporation, and the one to be excepted, that is not yet known to have surrendered, is admittedly operated in concert with the other by joint traffic agreement. Practically, so far as the public is concerned, there is but one telegraph company, and however ready parties might be to invest capital in a company to erect lines and contract with the Government for a low-rate limited postal telegraphic service, the fear of bankruptcy by reason of such formidable opposition debars all such enterprises. It is not alone the powerful syndicate of owners of the telegraph company that must be met and persuaded, but there are other interests connected with the telegraph business that stand out against all measures looking to a telegraphic service in any form by the Government. The growing strength of this corporation, whose capital stock is quoted in 1858 as standing at $358,700, may be better understood from the following paragraphs taken from its last annual report:

"But since the expiration of the fiscal year some action has been taken which should not pass unnoticed in this report. By order of the board of directors a meeting of stockholders has been called for October 25 instant to vote on the question of authorizing an increase of $13,800,000 in the capital stock of the company, making the aggregate capital stock $100,000,000.

"In the last previous report it was shown that the surplus earnings remaining uncapitalized on the 30th of June, 1891, was $13,015,925. It has been shown in the foregoing statements that the surplus has increased during the year covered by this report, and was, on the 30th of June, 1892, $15,174,310.94, to which several hundred thousand dollars have been added during the first quarter of the ensuing year. Of this surplus it is proposed to capitalize $13,800,000 by the issue of that amount of additional capital stock, and make the total capital stock an even $100,000,000."

The Postmaster-General then proceeds to show not only how great and illegitimate the profits of this company are, but also how the Post-Office Department was handicapped by the demand of this great agency for performing its constitutional functions.

Hon. C. A. Sumner, of California, before the House Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads on March 25, 1884, said:

I lay it down as a proposition that I want to have duly considered by this committee and the country that the Constitution of the United States, as interpreted by a century of unchallenged legislation, does imperatively require that the Congress of the United States shall establish a postal system. I lay it down as a fundamental proposition that the postal telegraph is a part of the postal system of the Government, the postal telegraph of the United States having been established for the purpose of transmitting intelligence between inhabitants of the land.

The Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of 1874, which numbered among its members such men as Hannibal Hamlin and Alexander Ramsay, said in its report on a bill similar to this one:

The Constitution devolved upon Congress the duty of transmitting all correspondence, including that by telegraph as well as that by mail.

Probably one of the most convincing statements that has been made on this question was by the Ways and Means Committee of the House in 1845. The Government had already built the first telegraph line and the question of extending the service under Government ownership as a part of the postal system was under consideration by the committee. The committee unanimously took the position that it was the duty of the Government to have the Post-Office Department to use every new and improved invention to assist in transmitting intelligence in the most rapid and effective manner, and that therefore it was the plain duty of the Government to use the telegraph, that "last and most wondrous birth of this wonder-teeming age," as an instrument for the functions of the Post-Office Department.

I ask permission to insert as part of my remarks the following extract from that able and clear statement of the case by the Committee on Ways and Means in the year 1845.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The Government is authorized and required by the Constitution to carry intelligence. The function thus devolved on the Government of performing for the people the office of universal letter carrier and news carrier is a matter of the very highest consequence in every light in which it can be viewed. The bare fact that our ancestors refused to leave it dependent on individual enterprise or State control and rested it expressly in Congress abundantly attested their anxious sense of its importance and their conviction of the impracticability of realizing the requisite public advantages from it otherwise than by giving it Federal lodgment and administration. But though not anticipated or foreseen, these new and improved modes were as clearly within the purview of the Constitution as were the older and less perfect ones with which our ancestors were familiar, and there being no doubt entertained either on this point or as to the obligation of the Government to lay hold of the best and most rapid methods of transmission which the improvement of the age puts in its reach, steam power commended itself at once to adoption and has long been extensively employed both on land and water for the carriage of the mail.

It is not without full reflection that the committee insist on the principle that it was the duty as well as the right of the Government thus to avail itself, even at heavy additional expense, of the powerful agency of steam for the purpose of accelerating the mails. It would have been a gross and manifest dereliction to have permitted that vitally important concern, the transportation of the mail—a concern so anxiously intrusted by the Constitution to Federal authority—to lag behind the improvements of the age, and to be outstripped by the pace of ordinary travel and commercial communication. Such is the view which the Post-Office Department takes of its own obligation and upon which it habitually acts. To be outstripped by private expresses is deemed discreditable to the Department, injurious to the general interests of the country, and a thing therefore not to be permitted.

This great and fundamental principle upon which the Department acts (of not being outstripped in the transmission of correspondence and intelligence) led necessarily to using the steam engine in the service of the post-office, and it must and will lead with equal certainty to the adoption of any other newly discovered agency or contrivance possessing decided advantages of celerity over previously used methods. The same principle which justified and demanded the transference of the mail on many chief routes from the horse-drawn coach on common highways to steam-impelled vehicles on land and water is equally potent to warrant the calling of the electro-magnetic telegraph—that last and most wondrous birth of this wonder-teeming age—in aid of the post-office in discharge of its great function of rapidly transmitting correspondence and intelligence.

Mr. BUTLER. Judge Brown, a member of the present Supreme Court of the United States, a man who is recognized as one of the ablest members of that august body, in a leading article in the August number of the Forum, said:

If the Government may be safely intrusted with the transmission of our letters and papers, I see no reason why it may not also be intrusted with the transmission of our telegrams and parcels; as is almost universally the case in Europe.

Judge Walter Clark, of the supreme court of North Carolina, one of the ablest lawyers and one of the most profound economic thinkers in the United States, in a leading article in the December (1895) number of the Arena, said what I shall ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as indicated.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say in this connection that Judge Clark has probably given as much thought to this question as any other man in America.

The Secretary read as follows:

Many who admit the great advantages, nay, the necessity of the telegraph and the telephone being operated as a part of the postal system are deterred by the inquiry, "Is it constitutional?" In truth it is unconstitutional for this essential branch of the postal system to be o erated by a private monopoly or in any other manner than by the Government. When the Constitution placed the post-offices in the hands of the Government it conferred its exclusive operation upon the Government, and with it all means of operating it to the best advantage. The bestowal of exclusive right and duty to operate the post-offices carried with it beyond question the exclusive right and duty to use all the agencies that would make the post-office most highly efficient as such agencies, from time to time, should be improved or invented. On this principle the first telegraph line was built by a Congressional appropriation under an Administration which, by that period in its history, had become a strict-constructive Administration (Tyler's), and the telegraph belonged to and was operated by the Government from 1844 to 1846, in Polk's Administration.

Mr. BUTLER. Judge Clark in addition has prepared a very clear, yet short and concise statement as to the constitutionality of a postal telegraph, showing that it is unconstitutional for the Government not to take charge of the telegraph and telephone as instruments of the postal system, which was published in the American Law Review a few months ago. For the convenience of the Senate, and especially the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in considering this bill, I ask that it be placed in the same Senate document with the summary of the hearings of the committee by Professor Parsons.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. When, under a mistaken notion of economy, the telegraph system was turned over to private ownership, Henry Clay, the great Whig leader, and Cave Johnson, the Democratic Postmaster-General at that time, were among the public men who went on record as earnestly protesting against such a step. They not only pointed out the unconstitutionality of such a course, but also called attention to the absolute necessity for the Post-Office Department to use this and every other invention that would extend the scope and increase the efficiency of the postal service of the United States.

The strong position taken by these two eminent men in public life caused Congress, when it passed the act of July 24, 1866, to reserve the right to take charge of all telegraph lines thereafter built as a Government function on demand, at any time after five years, upon payment of the actual value of the poles, wires, etc.

I ask the Secretary to read the three important provisions of this significant act of Congress, because my bill empowers the Postmaster-General to proceed under that act of Congress (July 24, 1866) as one method of establishing the postal telegraph.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him the date of that act of Congress?

Mr. BUTLER. The act was passed July 24, 1866, I will say to the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from North Carolina.

The Secretary read as follows:

The act provides in substance as follows:

"First. That Government business shall have priority of transmission over all other business and shall be sent at rates to be annually fixed by the Postmaster-General.

"Second. That the rights and privileges hereby granted shall not be transferred by any company acting under this act to any other corporation, association, or persons: Provided, That the United States may at any time after the expiration of the five years from the date of the passage of this act, for postal, military, or other purposes, purchase all the telegraph lines, property, and effects of any company at an appraised value to be ascertained by five competent, disinterested persons, two of whom shall be selected by the Postmaster-General of the United States, and two by the company interested, and one by the four so previously selected.

"Third. That before any telegraph company shall exercise any of the powers and privileges conferred by this act such company shall file their written acceptance with the Postmaster-General of the restrictions and obligations required by this act."

Mr. BUTLER. We can see there how careful the Government was to protect itself when it temporarily turned over the telegraph system to a monopoly. It will be observed that this act distinctly recognizes the telegraph as a governmental function and expressly provides that the Government can take charge of any and all telegraph lines after five years whenever it sees fit for postal or other services. Therefore the bill which I have offered is not only in harmony with that act, but it is in harmony with the Constitution of the United States, which makes it the duty of Congress to provide for a postal telegraph system and for using any other new, advanced, and improved agencies that may be invented for the transmission of intelligence.

The five-year limit referred to above expired in 1871. Mr. Creswell, of Maryland, who was Postmaster-General at the time under President Grant, called the attention of Congress to the fact in his annual report in December of that year. He also urged Congress to take charge of the telegraph and use it as an agency of the Post-Office Department for extending and improving the mail facilities, and also for the purpose of putting the telegraph in reach of the people. He was surprised to find that Congress did not act on his recommendation. But he continued to investigate the matter and to recommend a postal telegraph more strongly each year.

In his annual report of 1873 Postmaster-General Creswell, after being disappointed at the inertness and indifference of Congress, says:

> There are now but two parties in the controversy over the postal telegraph—on one side the people, on the other the Western Union Telegraph Company.

That was the way in 1873 in which the Postmaster-General sized up the situation and pointed out the reason why the postal telegraph was not established. I quote his words exactly: "On one side the people, on the other the Western Union Telegraph Company." That same condition exists to-day, and Congress is here as the judge between the people and the Western Union Telegraph Company. Will our verdict be for the people and for justice, or will it be for the telegraph monopoly?

The testimony of Postmaster-General Creswell, of Postmaster-General Wanamaker, and of other Postmasters-General, in addition to the 18 reports by committees of Congress, show conclusively that we have the poorest telegraph service in the world, not a country excepted, and that we pay a higher price for this poor service than any other country pays for a better service.

But, Mr. President, there is plenty of evidence outside of the reports of Congressional committees and of Postmasters-General to prove that. Prof. Richard T. Ely, of the University of Wisconsin, who has studied the telegraph system of this country and Europe by personal investigation and experience, in the December number of the Arena for 1895 says:

> Certainly the contrast between the service in this country and the service in Germany is most painful to one who has lived in both countries. The service in this country is so defective and so irregular that frequently the telegraph is not used when it would be a great convenience. It is impossible to send a telegram and to be sure that a prompt reply will be received. The writer of this article has sent a telegram the distance of some 400 miles, and has given the telegram a start of twenty-four hours, and then taken a train and arrived at the destination on the same day on which the telegram was delivered. This is by no means an isolated experience.
> So far as the writer's experience goes, it is seldom that a telegram is received in the United States which in spelling and every other particular is absolutely correct. Whereas he does not remember to have received a telegram in Germany in which there were any mistakes whatever. Why this should be the case is apparent when one visits the telegraph offices in both countries. Experienced and tried men, with comparatively short hours, are employed in Germany; while in the telegraph offices of this country one finds very young lads, and they are frequently overworked.
> The telegraph service in the United States is poor because the offices are so frequently closed. A few years since, when it was of virgin importance that a telegram should be sent from Richmond, Va., not an office could be found open until 7 o'clock in the morning. Offices are closed on the whole or a great part of Sunday. No one will be hypocrite enough to pretend that this is due to any scruples with regard to the observance of Sunday. It is simply due to pecuniary consideration. The convenience of the public is lightly considered and neglected, when it does not bring in any net returns to minister to this convenience. A comparison with the post-office is again to the disadvantage of the telegraph, although the telegraph service is more urgent. When it is remembered that telegrams so often deal with matters of life and death, even the strictest Sabbatarian must acknowledge that there is strong reason why telegraph offices should be open every day. The service of the United States is poor because the number who are accommodated with the convenience of a telegraph office is far smaller than it should be. The Post-Office Department plants a post-office even in rural districts, and attempts to provide all of the people with postal facilities at a uniform rate of postage. Every post-office should be at the same time a telegraph office, and might be one if the telegraph were a part of the postal service.

There are 70,000 post-offices in the United States, but there are only 21,000 telegraph offices. True, the report of the company shows over 21,000 offices, but inasmuch as there are often in cities three or four telegraph offices around one post-office, it may be safely estimated that for the purpose of this comparison there are only 15,000 telegraph offices in the United States; that is, that only 15,000 post-offices have telegraph offices near them, while there are 55,000 country post-offices with no telegraph office nearer than, possibly, the county seat, and often none at county seats. If the Post-Office Department should use the telegraph and telephone as a part of the postal system, then a telegraph or a telephone could be put in every one of these 70,000 post-offices, and the cost of each message could be reduced to one-fourth what it now costs.

Some may question that statement, but after a careful examination of the reports of these committees and an investigation as to the management of the telegraph in other countries I feel safe in repeating that the cost can be reduced to one-fourth, and besides, telegraph operators could be paid better wages, the messages could be sent with more rapidity and accuracy, and 69,000,000 people who do not now use the telegraph would at once have this great lightning mail facility extended to their doors at a cost within the reach of all. All of this can be done at a less cost to the American people than the present imperfect private monopoly system.

Not only that, but I say, Mr. President, that if the Post-Office Department would take charge of the telegraph and telephone and put them in every post-office in America, they could reduce the cost and still make enough money to give free rural mail delivery to every home in the United States. The Postmaster-General says that would cost $20,000,000. Take his estimate as correct, and I stand here and challenge contradiction when I say that the Government can use the telegraph and telephone and reduce the cost and still make enough revenue for the Post-Office Department to give every home in America the same free mail delivery that the people in the cities and towns now get. That is, we can extend the telegraph or the telephone to every one of the 70,000 post-offices and reduce the cost of messages, and, in addition, have a special free rural mail delivery, without any extra cost to the people. What a wonderful improvement this would be! Will Congress do it, or will it ignore the Constitution and the people in the interests of the telegraph monopoly?

In 1870 England took charge of the telegraph as a part of her postal system. "Extortion, error, and inadequacy" were the charges which Gladstone brought against the private telegraph monopoly; and under his leadership Parliament took charge of the telegraph as a Government function. At once the Government doubled the number of offices, and extended the service to every quarter of the Kingdom. Not only this, but the rates were reduced one-half. What was the result? While the private monopoly owned the telegraph only 1 telegram was sent to every 121 letters. Under the Government management the number of telegrams increased 600 per cent; that is, that 1 telegram was sent for every 23 letters. In this country, where the people have more need for rapid communication over great distances than in the Old World, it is safe to estimate that the number of telegrams would increase to ten times the present number if it were used as a public function, at cost, for the public good. Every country in Europe uses the telegraph as a government function and as an agency of the post-office department.

In this connection, Mr. President, I want to ask to have printed, not as a part of my speech, but as an executive document, a report made by our consul at Southampton, England, in consular reports for April, 1895. I do not desire to have the whole report published; but Judge Clark, of my State, has condensed and edited it, and in the form in which he has condensed and edited it and published it in the Arena of August, 1895, it is very instructive and readable, and I will ask that it be printed with the other two documents for the convenience of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the usual rate for a telegram in England is 10 cents for 20 words and one-half a cent for each additional word. It may be charged by some that the distances are shorter in Europe than here, but the fact is that the rate per mile in Europe is less than one-half of what it is in this country; and there, where messages have to go over a great distance they have to be transferred from one Government system to another in passing over different Kingdoms, which adds to the cost. Here each message would be conveyed by the same system, which would enable us to send a message perhaps 50 per cent cheaper per mile than in Europe—that is, under Government management, a message could, in this country, be sent for one-fourth what it now costs under private monopoly.

Postmaster-General Wanamaker testified before the Bingham committee—one of the committees to which I have referred—that a message of 20 words could now be sent to any and every point in the United States at the uniform rate of 10 cents. We are now charged 25 cents for 10 words for even the shortest distance, and as the distance increases the cost increases. A few days ago I sent a message of 10 words to Chicago. It cost me 68 cents. About 5 cents of that amount went to pay for operating expenses, etc. The other 63 cents went to make up the enormous dividend of 300 per cent on watered and fictitious stock. Five cents went to labor and legitimate business. Sixty-three cents went as a tribute to the Goulds, the Astors, the Sages, the Vanderbilts, and other multimillionaires who run this monopoly as a millionaire machine. Postmaster-General Wanamaker testified that the profits of this telegraph monopoly were so enormous that a man who invested $1,000 in Western Union Telegraph stock is now drawing at least $3,000 a year in profits from that $1,000 invested.

Is there any other business in the world that pays $3,000 profit in the year on $1,000 invested? Yet Congress sits still, seeing that agency used by that tremendous private monopoly, while the Post-Office Department and the people suffer thereby. Would any man outside of a lunatic asylum allow his business to be run without the benefit of the latest improvements? Would any telephone company to-day attempt to do business without using the latest inventions to assist in sending telephone messages? Yet the Government, which is given the exclusive duty under the Constitution of transmitting intelligence, uses simply the old and antiquated methods, and allows private monopolies to come in and use all the new improvements in competition with it. It is worse than that. The Government allows a private monopoly to take absolute control of the fastest and swiftest and most wonderful agency that could be used for the transmission of intelligence to the people and use it for private gain without any regard to the interests of the public. Private monopolies use exclusively the telegraph and telephone, the most rapid agencies for the transmission of intelligence, to multiply millionaires, while the Post-Office Department and the public suffer thereby. Is this the will of the people or is it the will of monopoly? Is this the rule of the people or the rule of monopoly?

This testimony of Postmaster-General Wanamaker shows where 63 out of the 68 cents went that I paid on one telegram. It was to make $3,000 profit on $1,000 of investment.

At this point I will ask to insert an extract from Postmaster-General Wanamaker's testimony.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

The extract referred to is as follows:

Because of the manifest advantage to the country at large in the use of the post-offices for a quicker communication, not possible now in any other way than with the electric current, I hoped for some of the public spirit shown to the mail service by the railroads. But it appears that neither reduced rates nor conveniences are made by the telegraph companies except under the compulsion of competition. The influence and power of these corporations and, with some encouraging exceptions, the members of the press associations dependent upon them are, if not openly antagonistic, silently opposed to these conveniences that can only be obtained through the operations of a Government service that treats all people and all localities exactly alike.

* * * * * * *

It may be said that operators are paid more in this country than in foreign countries, and that that is a reason why rates should be higher. But the fact is known that American operators perform double the amount of work usual for operators abroad. The bankers and the speculators, who, it is stated, are the principal clients of the telegraph companies, may be content with present rates, but the resolutions of boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and working people's organizations sent to the Department show that business people generally, and wage people almost wholly, are far from being satisfied. And from the best information I have I believe that a telegraph company could make a great deal of money on a uniform 25-cent 20-word message to all parts of the country.

Mr. BUTLER. The Postmaster-General goes on to quote from the annual reports of the Western Union Telegraph Company to show how the stock of the company has been watered from a small amount up to over $100,000,000, and that, in addition to the large dividends declared on this watered stock, the new lines built by the company are not from additional capital invested but from the enormous earnings of the company.

The Western Union Telegraph Company, though it draws such enormous dividends on the little amount of stock actually invested, probably treats its employees more niggardly than any other corporation in America. It now works its operators from nine to sixteen hours a day, and pays them only about $40 per month on an average. No matter how long a man works for the company or how great his merit, his salary is never increased. If he complains and asks for higher wages, he is dropped and some boy, often with little experience, is substituted in his place at less pay. Hence it is that we see such a large number of small boys in the service of this monopoly, and simply because they can grind the life from them at less cost than from older and more experienced men. The policy of our Government with reference to the clerks in the Post-Office Department is exactly the opposite. The object of the Government is not only to pay fair prices for labor, but to increase wages upon the merit system. A postal clerk under the Government gets an average of $84 per month, and works only eight hours per day. The same policy could be pursued by the Government under a postal telegraph system, paying the laborer a better price, reducing the number of hours of work, promoting the employees on merit, and at the same time saving millions of dollars annually to the people. Under the present system the people get a poor service; the employees get small pay, while the telegraph monopoly draws from the people millions of dollars on fictitious and watered stock. The Post-Office Department does not charge high rates and overwork and underpay its employees to make millions; but this is just what would be done if it were run by a private monopoly for private gain.

Postmaster-General Wilson is one of the few Postmasters-General who oppose a postal telegraph. He gave his objections in the January number of the Arena. They are, in substance, as follows:

First. The postal telegraph would not pay. And in this connection he intimated that it would be better—I do not think I misunderstand him; I think it is plainly intimated—if the Post-Office Department should be turned over to the hands of the telegraph monopoly or the express company instead of being run by the Government. This is an alarming statement, coming from one who is supposed to be placed on guard as the trusted representative of the people over this great and important function of the Government.

The second objection is that there is no popular demand for it, because the telegraph is used chiefly for business purposes and by the newspapers, and not for correspondence. This last statement, that the telegraph is not much used by the public generally, I regret to say, is true; but it is due, as the Postmaster-General is bound to admit, to the management of the Western Union Telegraph system, and therefore is one of the strongest arguments against the present system and in support of a bill like the one which I have offered. He forgot to state that the same thing existed in Europe while private monopolies owned the telegraph; but that as soon as the governments used this great agency as a government function the tables were turned, and instead of 8 per cent of the telegrams being for social correspondence 60 per cent of the telegrams, under low rates and proper management and extended facilities, were at once used by the people. These are matters of record.

Third. The Postmaster-General concludes with the old threadbare veil behind which monopoly has so long hidden and thrived, that the Government should not do anything for the people that it could keep from doing.

I think that is a fair interpretation of the last objection of the Postmaster-General. According to his idea, we should allow private monopolies to run the asylums, because certainly it can be done by private individuals if they can find some way to make profit out of it; we should abolish our public-school systems, and let them be run by monopolies; we should abolish our jails and courts, because can not each man protect himself after some kind of a brute fashion? A man can protect his personal liberty without the help of the courts or police officers as well as he can protect himself against the telegraph monopoly or any other monopoly, and better, too.

On the same reasoning it would be just as sound to say that the jails and the courts should be left to private management. On the other hand, I hold that the correct theory is that the Government is simply an agent of the people to do for all of the people what can be better done by a public agent than by each private individual in his own behalf. I challenge contradiction of that statement as being the correct theory of a republican form of government. Those businesses which affect society in general, standing on the same plane with that duty of the Government for wanting peace and the preservation of law and order, should not be intrusted to individual management, judgment, or patriotism, but should be performed by the agent of all the people, for the benefit of all the people alike. That agent is the Government, and if this be not correct, then you need no Government.

Corporations want dividends; the people want a good service at low rates. Therefore no monopoly per se should ever be placed in the hands of a private corporation; but should in every case be used as a Government function for the public good. Thomas Jefferson and the other leading patriots who formed our Constitution and laid down the chart for our future liberty were uncompromisingly opposed to all kinds of monopolies. They considered monopoly the greatest menace to liberty and the deadliest foe to free institutions. They took the position that any business that affected all or a great portion of the people under circumstances where there could be no successful competition by men of small means was a Government function, and should be owned and operated by the Government at cost for the benefit of all of the people alike.

They were not only opposed to all monopolies, but they were unalterably opposed to allowing private individuals or corporations to have charge of or control any business that was a monopoly per se. They foresaw that private corporations would run such a business, not for the benefit of the people, but would take advantage of their monopoly to bleed the people for the benefit of a few. They knew that this would result in a poor and imperfect service for the people at a very high cost, and besides be a constant and growing menace to good government. The postal system of this country is a monopoly per se. Therefore, for this reason the framers of our Constitution decided that the postal system should be owned and operated by the Government instead of by private corporations. It could not be operated by private corporations except as a private monopoly itself, a monopoly by nature. Therefore it is the duty of the Government to use it as a Government function.

If the same parties who are now managing the Western Union

Telegraph Company had charge of the postal system it would cost no less than 10 cents, and probably more, to send a letter where it can now be sent for 2 cents under Government management. And, besides, the people could not get a post-office or a mail line where they needed it until they convinced the mail monopoly that such an office and such a postal line would independently pay a profit into the pocket of the private corporation, or until the people could be forced to vote by townships and counties to tax themselves to issue bonds to raise thousands of dollars to give to the mail monopoly as a bonus, as the people now often have to do to get a telegraph line or a railroad for their community.

I wish to repeat that statement. No community could get a post-office or star route run into it if the mail were in the hands of a private monopoly until they convinced the private monopoly that that special post-office out in that special neighborhood would pay expenses. Then the people in a majority of the country districts would not get a post-office until they raised money by taxation and gave it as a bonus or a subsidy to the mail monopoly to establish a post-office in their community. Nobody will question that, for that is exactly what every corporation does to-day which is situated in the same way with reference to the transmission of intelligence or of freight and passengers.

Had it not been for the wisdom, the foresight, and patriotism of our forefathers we would to-day be cursed by a tremendous mail monopoly which would be daily absorbing the substance of the people on one hand and building up another class of haughty and oppressive millionaires on the other hand, who would probably be styled "postal kings." Yes; if the Post-Office Department were to-day in the hands of a private corporation over one-half of the citizens of America would be even without the facilities of a post-office. Half of them would have to ride ten miles at least to mail a letter, and then pay five or ten times as much as they pay now.

But this is not the worst side of such a system of private monopoly, for when the people would begin to complain of bad and expensive management of the mails under private operation and call upon the State legislatures and Congress to regulate the price of postage and to correct said abuses those postal kings would at once begin to dispense franking privileges to every prominent politician who would take them, a kind of free pass for their letters, as the telegraph monopolies now dispense to politicians and to legislators when they will take them. I would not be surprised if the telegraph monopoly has offered a frank to every member of Congress. Certainly then the mail monopoly, if we had one, would offer its franks.

Not only this, but the postal kings in the next campaign would use a part of the millions they had wrung from the people to try to defeat every honest candidate for any legislative branch of the Government; and if perchance a majority should be elected against them they would send a hired horde of lobbyists to our legislative halls to try to defeat the will of the people. The people might by a supreme effort overcome the corrupt use of money in the elections and in the legislative halls and get some law passed for their protection, or they might even get a postal commission established with full power to regulate the price of postage, with full power to force the mail monopoly to establish new offices and postal lines where necessary, and to deliver the mail oftener and in a manner more convenient to the people; but from some cause, whether from a want of courage or because the postal kings manage to make friends with them, such a commission would probably never rise to the point of correcting the abuses or forcing the monopolies to do justice. But even if the members of the commission should be pure and incorruptible men and should attempt to execute the law and do their full duty, what would happen? A lot of newspapers, which would be owned and run by the postal kings, would at once begin a tirade of abuse and misrepresentation. They would brand the members of the postal commission as anarchists, and make many good men believe that the members of the commission were bad and dangerous men.

Is this not exactly what the railroad corporations, telegraph monopolies, and express companies are doing to-day? If it was necessary for the Government to own and operate the postal system to give the people a good mail service at cost, to protect their rights, and to prevent the creation of rich monopolies who attempt to corrupt the Government, then is it not criminal in us, the sworn representatives of the people, to allow a private monopoly to take, usurp, and use the greatest and most powerful agency necessary for the equipment and perfection of the postal system? We are allowing a private monopoly not only to use the most powerful and profitable agency for operating an effective postal system, but we are allowing it to use it for private gain. We are allowing them to misuse it, I may say, while the post-office of the people suffers thereby.

The policy of our Government in managing the post-office is to try to extend facilities to every corner of the country, whether or not a special post-office on the frontier or in a farming community pays. In fact, whether or not the amount of mail carried to one office is one-tenth enough to pay its expenses, it has been the policy of our Government to try to extend its facilities to every portion of our country and to every class of our people. Is this the policy that any private monopoly follows? Is there a single monopoly in America of any kind which is moved by such a motive? No. On the contrary, the Western Union Company do not establish a single office unless they think that the office will pay not only expenses but also a rich dividend in addition by itself.

The Government maintains post-offices and post lines in sparsely settled communities. How? By the profits it gets by maintaining post-offices in thickly settled communities. That is the true theory, to take the profits that are made from operating mails in thickly settled communities and pay the expenses of operating the mail system where it will not pay more than one-tenth of its cost.

Now, should we have our telegraph and telephone systems managed on the same just and equitable plan as the Government post-office? Which theory is correct? Which is the more conducive to the happiness and the welfare of the people? That is the question for Congress to answer.

But instead of Congress trying to bring the improved agency of the telegraph on the same plane as the post-office, I regret to say that there are some evidences that there is a growing sentiment among a few—I hope only a few—to try to change the post-office system to the low monopoly plane of the Western Union Telegraph system; that is, to try to bring the Post-Office Department to the principle of not extending mail facilities except where that special line will pay. It seems to be the purpose to have the Government mail facilities operated on the principle of a private monopoly.

There is now pending at the other end of the Capitol a bill which I am afraid is a step in this direction. It is known as the Loud bill. It seems to be a first step. It proposes to deny to certain newspapers and periodicals the privilege of passing through the mails at second-class postage rates. The argument which is advanced to support this bill is that each kind of matter carried through the mails should be set off to itself, and a separate account kept with it, and made to pay expenses by itself without reference to the other matter sent through the mails. As I said, I fear that this is but the first step, and if it is not checked here and now that the next step will be to discontinue every mail line in country districts the receipts from which are not great enough to pay the operating expenses.

If the theory of the Loud bill is correct, then on the same reasoning you can discontinue every post-office in the country that is not self-sustaining, as well as every postal line. It is passing strange to hear men who advocate such measures basing their arguments on the ground of their great desire and interest in seeing the Post-Office Department made self-sustaining. They say they fear the people will be taxed to support the post-office and that we should cut down its expenses in some way.

I take this opportunity to warn the people from ocean to ocean that this measure known as the Loud bill can not result in any good to the people. It can not result in the diffusion of intelligence, but is bound to result in checking it. There may be more in it than we see on its face. At any rate, as I said, it is the first step backward—the first step in the wrong direction. The theory on which it is based is vicious and dangerous. If it passes other bills will be sure to follow on that line.

Mr. President, I do not charge that the bill is prompted in the least by monopoly, but one thing is clear, that such a bill would result to the benefit of the monopolies and to the detriment of the people. It would be a deathblow to small newspapers and cheap current literature and the dissemination of intelligence among the poorer classes of our people. But the monopoly newspapers would not be affected by such a bill. In this connection I wish to say that such a bill would break down competition for monopoly papers and practically give them a monopoly of the field if it is carried out to its full extent. Mark you, the telegraph system is now used so that the people can not avail themselves of information through it in a popular sense, and now a step is taken to deprive the people of even the slow and antiquated method used in the Post-Office Department for getting their information unless they take it from such papers as can get through the Post-Office Department under these regulations.

One of the greatest reasons why the telegraph should be used as a part of the Government postal system is to reduce press rates so that every newspaper in the country could receive each night telegraphic dispatches at a low rate and publish the news from one end of the country to the other each morning contemporaneously with the big papers in the large cities of the country. To-day this vast monopoly has its crushing and blighting grip upon the intelligence and news of the country. A paper in California should be able to get from its special correspondent in Washington the telegraphic dispatches from this point as cheaply as a paper in New York. Not only that, but opportunity should be furnished dozen of rival news agencies to gather the news and send it over the wires in competition with each other and at low rates from one end of the country to the other. It is impossible to do it now.

No people can defend their liberty unless they are intelligent; no people can be intelligent if false statements are given to them as facts, if news is suppressed or perverted, because then they cast their votes, acting on wrong premises, to enslave themselves and enthrone monopolies. The present telegraph system operates to this end, if not for this purpose. To-day, therefore, the liberty as well as the perpetuity of this Government depends upon tearing the hands of greedy and oppressive monopoly from the information and intelligence of the country and allowing the people the freest, cheapest, and widest possible use of the most rapid agencies for communicating intelligence.

I wish in this connection to call attention to a part of Postmaster-General Wanamaker's report for 1892, page 29, where he said that the postal telegraph is vastly more important to the people than subsidies for fast mails. I call attention to this fact, because it was only last Tuesday that the Senate by a large vote granted a special subsidy to one railroad line for the purpose of fast mail in the face of the statement of the Postmaster-General that such a subsidy is not necessary, in the face of the statement of the Postmaster-General that the subsidy of $196,000 would not add to the efficiency of the postal service. Yet the Senate voted that subsidy, and the reason given was that the Postmaster-General might be wrong and that it might increase the mail facilities and give the people in New Orleans mail from Boston a few hours sooner.

Now, I offer a bill which will reduce the time of the mail from forty-eight hours to forty-eight minutes, and if fast-mail facilities constitute a controlling influence and if the necessity for fast-mail service is the reason why that much money was voted under doubtful conditions, then how can we refuse to vote for a bill to reduce the mail from hours to minutes, that can give the people intelligence in forty-eight minutes instead of forty-eight hours, and at a cost within the reach of all? It is true that there is one monopoly opposed to such action, but surely the wishes or interests of that monopoly will not keep us from giving the people the facilities of a very fast mail.

It is an outrage upon civilization that one of the greatest inventions of all ages should be permitted to be captured by corporate greed, kept out of reach of the great mass of the people, and reserved for uses in which the business of gamblers form the chief part, and even given the priority of transmission over all other business. A company that manages the telegraph with such little wisdom and public spirit ought not to be allowed to control it. Franklin interceded with Heaven to secure the use of the lightning as a servant of the people; but behold, this last gift of Heaven has been wrested from the people and seized by a monopoly—a moneyed aristocracy—and used as their servant for private gain. Think of it. Fifty years since the lightning was harnessed to language and literature, and the people can not even yet avail themselves of the discovery; fifty years, and gamblers are still the main beneficiaries; fifty years, and Wall street is still in possession, and a great Government lying apparently helpless to take charge of it and use it for the common good.

Yes; it is as true to-day as it was in 1873, when Postmaster-General Creswell said that there were but two parties to this question. On one side are the people, and on the other is the Western Union telegraph monopoly. The case is before Congress; we are the sworn representatives of the people. Will the verdict be in favor of the selfish profits of this most monstrous monopoly, or will it be to give the people their constitutional rights?

Mr. President, I ask that the bill with the amendment and this Senate document which I have asked to be printed be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so referred.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the Indian appropriation bill be now proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6249) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish the Senate would revert to and dispose of the reserved amendment on page 28. It is a committee amendment. I think we might as well dispose of it now as at any other time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment indicated will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 28, after the word "dollars," in line 19, the Committee on Appropriations report to strike out:

Provided, That the sums of money mentioned in this and the preceding paragraph shall be paid to said Indians by an officer designated by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas rose.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator from Arkansas proceeds, will he allow me for one moment? Yesterday I moved to strike out the provision that the members of the commission proposed on page 50 should be of different political parties. The motion which I made to that effect was lost. Then it was followed by another provision in the bill that the Secretary of the Interior should make certain negotiations with other Indian tribes, and I proposed, rather as a method of reductio ad absurdum, a provision that he should also associate with himself some person of a different political faith from his own. That was adopted by a very thin Senate. I did not suppose it would be adopted when I moved it. It was a way of showing what I thought was the unreasonableness of the position on the other side. I should like to have the amendment reconsidered before the Senate proceeds with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 28, reported by the committee, which has been stated.

Mr. PETTIGREW. At the request of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], we will pass over this amendment. I withdraw any objection to rejecting the amendment to the amendment adopted yesterday on motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment to the amendment which I moved be reconsidered.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The other amendment can be disposed of in a second. I requested that the amendment on page 28 should go over on account of the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]. I hope it will not be taken up until his return unless, in the meantime, the bill shall reach its final stage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment referred to by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] will be passed over, if there be no objection. The Chair requests the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to restate his motion.

Mr. HOAR. On page 3175 of the RECORD——

Mr. PETTIGREW. Page 51 of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senate to reconsider the vote by which it agreed to the amendment to the amendment inserting in line 1, page 51, the words "associating with himself some other person of different political faith from his own."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to having those words stricken out.

Mr. HOAR. It is merely to reconsider the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the vote by which the amendment to the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator from South Dakota to allow the amendment which I offered yesterday to the amendment on page 33 to be amended so as to use the word "woolen" in the amendment wherever the word "flannel" occurs. The amendment I offered, which was accepted yesterday, has not been printed. It was an amendment to the committee amendment appearing in lines 1 to 3 on page 33 of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the amendment to the amendment was adopted yesterday by the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir; but I wish to have this correction made. The amendment to the amendment which was adopted yesterday uses the word "flannel" in speaking of certain clothing. The treaty of 1889 calls for woolen clothing, and I wish to have the word "woolen" used in place of the word "flannel" in the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I accept the modification. I think that is what the Senator from Nebraska intended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the modification indicated will be made in the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to dispose of the amendment I offered yesterday to the amendment of the committee on page 51. It has been printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 51, in lieu of the amendment of the committee embraced in lines 16 to 20, inclusive, insert:

For the survey of lands in the Cheyenne River and Rosebud Indian reservations in South Dakota, the sum of $30,000, to be immediately available; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby directed to survey the lands embraced in said reservations.

For examination in the field of the survey of lands within the Cheyenne River and Rosebud Indian reservations in South Dakota, under the direction of the surveyor-general, including clerical work in the office of the surveyor-general, the sum of $6,000.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the amendment be read again. I do not understand it exactly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment, and was interrupted by Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is sufficient. I do not care for a full reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], proposed as a substitute for the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to dispose of the paragraph at the bottom of page 50 which was reserved yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations at the bottom of page 50 will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Appropriations report, on page 50, at the beginning of line 15, to strike out "to enable the Secretary of the Interior" and insert:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint a commission to consist of three persons, not more than two of whom shall be of the same political party, and not more than one of whom shall be resident of any one State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has an amendment pending to this amendment. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Amend the amendment of the committee by striking out, in lines 17 and 18, the words "not more than two of whom shall be of the same political party."

Mr. WILSON. The form of the amendment of the committee is an old form, and it has been used upon several occasions. When the Puyallup Commission was created we used the same language that the committee has used here. I understand, however, that the amendment to the amendment will not be pressed.

Mr. HOAR. I do not want this very vicious principle of legislation to pass when I am present without protesting against it. I think the idea of dividing the commission on such a matter between two political parties is utterly vicious. It recognizes the spoils system in the most offensive way to say that each party must have a member on a public commission. There is no reason why politics should be considered in this matter at all. The bill puts some of these matters into the power of the Secretary of the Interior, who is to make the negotiation himself; others are put into the hands of a commission, and others are made through single officers who are to be sent out.

Why we should treat the public service of the country in this way I can not understand. I have always raised my voice against such provisions when they have come under my notice, and in several instances they have been stricken out by the Senate by general consent. As this is a comparatively unimportant matter and the Senate is thin, and to force a yea-and-nay vote on it would delay the bill for half an hour and compel a call of the Senate, I shall not press a vote on the amendment to the amendment at this time, but will abandon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his amendment to the amendment. Therefore the question recurs upon the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations passed over was, on page 50, after the word "desirable," at the end of line 22, to strike out "by said Secretary of the Interior"; so as to make the paragraph read:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint a commission to consist of three persons, not more than two of whom shall be of the same political party, and not more than one of whom shall be resident of any one State, to negotiate with the Yakima Indians in the State of Washington for the surrender of a portion of their reservation lands, and for such modification of existing treaties as may be deemed desirable, any agreement thus negotiated being subject to subsequent ratification by Congress, $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On page 51 the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] proposed an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the committee amendment, line 13, on page 54, insert:

And a majority of the members of any board or commission to be paid from this appropriation shall be appointed from bona fide residents of the State or Territory in which is located the particular reservation concerning which such board or commission is appointed to negotiate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I accept the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The amendment of the committee was adopted yesterday, and I understand an amendment now offered to it is not in order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The whole paragraph was reserved when the amendment to it was offered yesterday. The question was not disposed of because of the fact that there was not a quorum present.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I did not think that the reservation covered the amendment of the committee on page 51. I should like to have the amendment again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be again read.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the whole amendment be read if we are going to amend an amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think the Senator will distinctly understand it if the amendment to the amendment is read without reading the amendment of the committee. It is to come in at the end of the paragraph.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to have the whole paragraph read if we are going to amend it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to insert the following, beginning at line 1, on page 51:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Uncompahgre tribe of Indians, and with the Indians residing upon the Uintah Reservation in the State of Utah, and with the Indians residing upon the Fort Hall Reservation in the State of Idaho, and, in his discretion, with any other Indians, for the surrender of any portions of their respective reservations, or for such modification of existing treaties and agreements as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, $15,000; and all agreements made for the purchase of the unallotted lands in any Indian reservation shall provide a fund for the payment of taxes upon inalienable allotments, but no agreement made shall take effect until ratified by Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee will now be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment just read the following:

And a majority of the members of any board or commission to be paid from this appropriation shall be appointed from bona fide residents of the State or Territory in which is located the particular reservation concerning which such board or commission is appointed to negotiate.

Mr. CHILTON. I did not understand the Senator from South Dakota to reserve the right to bring this question up at any time. I supposed that when he said it would be passed over he meant that we would pass over it until the clerks had finished the reading of the bill, and that we would then go back and take up this amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. These questions were passed over yesterday because it was apparent there was not a quorum then present——

Mr. CHILTON. I did not so understand it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. And a vote was demanded upon the question. However, I am willing that it shall go over, if the Senator from Texas desires.

Mr. CHILTON. I think it had better go over until we act upon the other amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendment of the committee and the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment will be passed over. The amendment which was pending at the time of the adjournment yesterday will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Appropriations report to insert, on page 55, after line 3, the following:

That the claim of the Fond du Lac band of Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior for compensation arising from the difference in area of the reservation as actually set apart to them and that provided to be set apart under the fourth subdivision of article 2 of the treaty between the United States and the Chippewas of Lake Superior and the Mississippi, made and concluded at Lapointe, in the State of Wisconsin, on the 30th day of September, in the year 1854, proclaimed January 29, 1855, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on said court, with right of appeal as in other cases, to hear and determine the same and to award judgment against the United States for the difference between the area of the reservation actually set apart to said Indians and that provided to be set apart in said treaty, if any, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, the said action to be brought by the said Fond du Lac band of Chippewa Indians against the United States by petition, verified under oath by any duly authorized attorney for said Indians, within thirty days from the passage of this act; and the Attorney-General shall appear and answer said petition within thirty days from the filing thereof, unless the time for pleading be extended by the court for cause shown; and said action shall have precedence in said court.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question for information. This proposed amendment reads:

And jurisdiction is hereby conferred on said court, with right of appeal as in other cases, to hear and determine the same and to award judgment against the United States for the difference between the area of the reservation actually set apart to said Indians and that provided to be set apart in said treaty.

I wish to ask if there is any other treaty modifying the treaty referred to here?

Mr. PETTIGREW. There is no other treaty modifying it as to the area of the reservation, as to the question in dispute.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There is no question as to what the treaty area of the reservation is?

Mr. PETTIGREW. There is question about it, because it was decided by natural boundaries, and the exact acreage is not known.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Were those actual boundaries ever adopted in any agreement with the Indians as being the proper area?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The treaty itself went on to mark out the boundaries and said that it should be bounded by certain rivers and lakes which the Indians thoroughly and familiarly understood.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Is the first treaty the one referred to here?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Was there any other treaty which modified that treaty, is the question I asked the Senator.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not to my knowledge. There is nothing in the papers to show it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If there was there ought to be provision made here that the court shall take into consideration which one of those treaties was binding, and Congress ought not by its act to declare that one of the treaties was binding if there was a subsequent treaty which modified the provisions of that treaty.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I know of no other treaty modifying this question in any way. There is nothing in any of the papers submitted to the committee to show it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the next amendment, beginning at line 4, on page 56, be passed over until to-morrow, and that we proceed to the amendment at line 15, page 57.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment indicated will be passed over for further consideration.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The paragraph beginning at line 15, on page 57, and ending at line 12, on page 58, will, I hope, be passed over. I doubt very much whether this provision should be adopted by the Senate at all; but I do not care to raise the question now, and prefer that it shall go over until the bill has been read through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment of the committee beginning at line 15, on page 57, will be temporarily passed over.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill on page 58, line 12. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 58, line 16, to increase the appropriation for support of Indian day and industrial schools and for other educational purposes from $1,135,000 to $1,335,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of the paragraph, at line 5, page 59, the paragraph as amended reading as follows:

SUPPORT OF SCHOOLS.

For support of Indian day and industrial schools, and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for, including pay of architect and draftsman, to be employed in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $1,335,000, of which amount the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, use $5,000 for the education of Indians in Alaska. And it is hereby declared that it is the intention of this act that no money herein appropriated shall be paid for education in sectarian schools, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby charged with the duty of so using and administering said appropriation as to carry out said object, and he is hereby authorized and required to make all needful rules and regulations necessary to prevent the use of any part of said fund for education in sectarian schools: Provided, That the foregoing shall not apply to public schools of any State, Territory, county, or city, or to schools herein or hereafter specifically provided for.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, or the committee, what is meant by "sectarian schools"? I understand in a broad and general way that sectarian schools ought not to be the object of legislative bounty, and that money taken by taxation from the pockets of the people ought not to be appropriated to the support of any school that is ostensibly, really, apparently, or professedly for the purpose of propagating the doctrines of any sect, Christian or Mohammedan.

But the word "sectarian," as used in this clause of the bill, is, I think, equivocal. I should like to know whether it applies to such a school as the Lincoln Institution. I have had a communication from some very worthy people who have devoted themselves to the cause of education among the Indians, benevolent people, whose views are worthy of consideration, valuable citizens of the Commonwealth in which they live, valuable citizens of the United States, who are as much imbued with the true American notion in regard to this matter as anyone on the floor of the Senate, and whose views, as I have said, are entitled to consideration. I, at all events, intend to give them consideration, and if this is the proper place in which to bring up the matter of the Lincoln Institution, I will do it now. If not I will wait until a more appropriate place is reached.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think that that matter would come up on page 65.

Mr. LODGE. It comes up later. The appropriations for the school at Hampton, Va., and the Lincoln Institution at Philadelphia, and which the committee report to strike out, are on page 65.

Mr. GRAY. All right. I will accept the suggestion and postpone what I have to say.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if the enforcement of this provision will not leave without any educational facilities provided by the Government about 5,000 Indian children now in certain schools partly sustained by Government aid on reservations where the Government has no facilities of any kind, character, or description for the education or care of these children? I propound that question.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In my opinion this provision will leave about 3,000 Indian children without any school facilities whatever. The provision, however, ought to be changed.

Mr. CARTER. I understand the fact to be that a change of policy upon this question was determined upon some years ago by the General Government. With that policy, intended to extend governmental control and supervision to the schools, I am in sympathy and accord. It was, however, determined at the inception of this movement that it should be advanced only when the Government had provided upon the different reservations educational facilities to be substituted for those now existing. In harmony with that thought and theory appropriations for private institutions have steadily decreased of late years. No opposition to this decrease has emanated from any source in the legislative council as far as I am advised. But Congress has heretofore acted upon the theory that when the contract school was deprived of support the Government school should be open to receive the pupil and thereafter give such education as the conditions required.

I understand that now, before the Government has facilities of any kind, character, or description for the education of the children, for instance, on the Flathead Reservation, in my State, it is proposed to withdraw absolutely from these wards of the Government all educational facilities, and to throw out upon the commons, to cast upon the open prairie, the children of the Flathead Reservation until in due time buildings can be constructed by the Government wherein they may be collected and educated in the future.

I do not conceive this to be in accord with sound public policy. It will result either in throwing upon private charity the whole burden of educating these infant wards of the Government or it will deprive them absolutely of all educational advantages for a number of years to come.

In view of the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs admits that this will be the result, I move to strike out of the bill all after the word "Alaska," in line 20, page 58, to and including the word "for," at the end of line 5, page 59.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will state that we are proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement to dispose of the committee amendments first, and that this amendment will be in order after we have gone through the bill.

Mr. CARTER. I make the motion to amend so as to reserve the right to take it up afterwards.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Montana withdraws his motion to amend at this time, as the Senate is proceeding under a unanimous agreement.

Mr. CARTER. I was not apprised of the agreement, and only bring the matter up at this time to save whatever right may exist in regard to amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I understand, then, that this matter will come up for debate later?

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the Senator from Montana chooses to renew his motion. He withdraws it.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment is not pending now?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is not pending.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understand that if the reading proceeds this paragraph will be open to amendment in the Senate at any time by any Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand it, the entire bill will be open to amendment after the committee amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes, after the reading of the bill has been concluded and action has been had upon the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at line 6, page 59. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 59, line 7, to increase the appropriation for construction, purchase, lease, and repair of school buildings and purchase of school sites from $40,000 to $140,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, line 13, after the word "built," to strike out:

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $40,000 for the purpose of erecting additional buildings for the Mount Pleasant Indian School at Mount Pleasant, Mich., namely, $30,000 for the erection of a girls' dormitory and dining hall, and $10,000 for the erection of a schoolhouse: Provided, That upon the completion of said buildings the Secretary of the Interior shall make no further contract for the education of Indian children in sectarian schools in the State of Michigan.

So as to make the clause read:

"For the purpose of erecting, constructing, and completing suitable school buildings for an Indian industrial school at or near Rapid City, in the State of South Dakota, which buildings are to be constructed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, upon plans and specifications to be approved by him, $25,000; out of which sum the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to purchase not exceeding 160 acres of land near Rapid City, at a cost of not exceeding $3,000, to be immediately available, upon which said buildings shall be built."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, after line 23, to insert:

For the erection and completion of suitable buildings, including the necessary furniture of all kinds for the same, for an industrial boarding school at or near the reservation of the Sac and Fox Indians in Tama County, Iowa, and for the purchase of a suitable site for the same, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, line 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "one"; so as to make the clause read:

For support of Indian industrial school at Carlisle, Pa., at not exceeding $167 for each pupil; and for transportion of pupils to and from said school, and for general repairs and improvements, $100,000; for additional to the salary of any military officer of Carlisle Indian School while acting as superintendent of said school, $1,000; in all, $101,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that amendment may be passed over for the present. I desire to offer an amendment which will change the footings somewhat; but I do not wish to do so under the rule that the committee amendments be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations will be passed over temporarily, in the absence of objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 63, after line 4, to insert:

For the erection and completion of additional buildings, including furniture of all kinds for the same, at the Indian school at Flandreau, S. Dak., so as to increase the capacity of said school to 300 pupils, $50,000; for the purchase of shade and ornamental trees and shrubbery for planting on school grounds, $300; in all, $50,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, after line 11, to insert:

For payment to Joseph Schwarz, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak., for making plans and estimates for an Indian school building at Flandreau, S. Dak., $350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, after line 15, to insert:

For payment to E. H. Dow & Co. for plumbing and completing water system for said school, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, line 15, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "for steam-heating plant, $10,000"; and in line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty-four" and insert "sixty-five"; so as to make the clause read:

For support and education of 300 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Genoal Nebr., at $167 per annum each, $50,100; for general repairs and improvements, $3,500; for steam-heating plant, $10,000; for pay of superintendent of said school, $1,700; in all, $65,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 65, to strike out:

For support and education of 120 Indian pupils at the school at Hampton, Va., $20,040.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask if the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, who is in charge of the pending bill, will not consent that that amendment be disagreed to?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I can not comply with that request. The Senate will have to dispose of that matter.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest, in view of the fact that we have agreed to take up another order of business at 4 o'clock, that it will be impossible to dispose of the Indian school question at this sitting of the Senate, and that this amendment be passed over, as the same question will undoubtedly be raised in connection with the other clauses about Indian schools.

Mr. LODGE. Is the proposition to pass over that part of the bill in relation to the Hampton School and Lincoln Institution?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I consent that they both be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. DANIEL. It seems to me that the pending amendment might be very soon disposed of. It is a matter which has been up here year and year again. It is an old story.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to say to the Senator from Virginia that we have agreed to take up at 4 o'clock pension bills on the Calendar, and it is now within ten minutes of that hour.

Mr. DANIEL. We can get through with this amendment in ten minutes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not believe we can dispose of it in ten hours.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to say that the next amendment, which is striking out the provision for the Lincoln Institution at Philadelphia, is upon the same basis with that of Hampton, and I suppose will be included in the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER]. I will not make any distinct motion myself in regard to it, if that be so, but otherwise I shall.

Mr. SEWELL. I wish to say that the school at Hampton, Va., is in no sense sectarian, nor is the school provided for in the following paragraph of the bill, and I think the question can be disposed of in a very few minutes if taken up and considered now. This school was instituted some years ago——

Mr. FAULKNER. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that we have not reached the paragraph to which he refers. The paragraph before the Senate is the one before that.

Mr. SEWELL. I have reference to that particular appropriation.

This school was established some years ago by philanthropic people in this country, and they have had for some years a number of Indian children there. It is in no sense sectarian; the management of it is composed of persons of different denominations, and even Catholics have contributed very largely to it. The school is supported by funds provided by that eminently philanthropic gentleman, the late George Peabody, of London.

I wish to present a statement of the case a little more clearly and definitely than has been heretofore made for want of knowledge, and I ask that it be read.

Mr. HAWLEY. Are we proceeding with the consideration of the paragraphs which the committee have reported to strike out on page 65?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the question before the Senate is upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, to strike out the clause from line 1 to line 3, on page 65.

Mr. HAWLEY. An amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. FAULKNER. No; the question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope some one will renew, or I will renew, the request that the amendment in regard to Hampton and Lincoln Indian schools go over. It is one of those things which require the consideration of a full Senate, and I should not consent to go on with it otherwise. I wish a full audience here while the discussion proceeds. We should have the full judgment of the Senate. I ask that the amendment go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over, if there be no objection.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask that the paper which I have sent to the desk may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the paper referred to by the Senator from New Jersey will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The paper referred to is as follows:

HAMPTON NORMAL AND AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE,
Hampton, Va., April 6, 1896.

DEAR SIR: For a number of years Congress has made an annual appropriation of $167 each for 120 Indians at the Hampton School.

I am informed that although the House has continued this appropriation, the action of the committee of the Senate has been unfavorable to its continuance on the ground of its alleged sectarian character.

I have the honor to call your attention to the following facts in regard to the Institution and its work.

The Hampton School was incorporated by the general assembly of the State of Virginia in the year 1870.

The purposes of the school as stated in its charter are as follows:

"The instruction of youth in common-school, academic, and collegiate branches, the best methods of teaching the same, and the best mode of practical industry in its application to agriculture and the mechanic arts."

It is governed by a board of 17 trustees, representing 6 different religious denominations, no one of which has a majority.

It receives help from the land-scrip fund through the State of Virginia to the amount of $10,000 per year as being an agricultural institution. A board of curators appointed by the governor of Virginia have a supervision of the use of these funds and make annual reports to the State authorities.

It also receives help from the Morrill Act fund, the Peabody and the Slater funds. You are aware that no aid is given by the Peabody fund to sectarian institutions.

The school receives aid from the board of no church, nor is it connected with any religious organization. It has among its staff and students both Catholics and Protestants. Its present chaplain was connected with both Congregational and Presbyterian churches before coming to the school. The church service includes the silent prayer of the Friends, a part of the service of the Episcopal Church, and the usual forms of the nonritualistics. The assistant chaplain is a member of the Episcopal Church; and communion service is administered on the school grounds to students belonging to the Baptist Church by a minister of that denomination.

The school receives help from Hebrews, Protestants, and Catholics, one of its donors being a Catholic priest. It has had among its guests and friends people of all denominations, and has prided itself upon the fact that wherever its meetings had been held throughout the country clergymen and laymen have been willing to speak in its behalf whatever denomination they represented. Its graduates have gone out to work in different churches; one of them is archdeacon in the Episcopal church; another has charge of a large institution supported by the Methodists; a number have gone as teachers into Catholic schools.

Hampton has a special claim upon the people of the country, because here the Government system of industrial education of Indians was first started. From its founding in 1870 until 1878 the school had been devoted to the education of negro youth.

After the Indian massacres and outrages of 1875, 70 Indians captured in the Indian Territory, representing the five tribes there in rebellion, the Cheyennes, Comanches, Kiowas, Arapahoes, and Apaches, were sent under the care of Capt. R. H. Pratt, United States Army, as prisoners and hostages to Fort Marion, St. Augustine, Fla.

After remaining in prison for three years under the instruction of Captain Pratt and some good ladies from the North, 15 asked to be allowed to receive further education. They were brought to Hampton because that was the only place that would receive and give them what they seemed especially to need, industrial education.

Captain Pratt spent one year at Hampton, then went out and established the Carlisle School. Out of the successful experiment of industrial education of the Indians in these two schools grew up the industrial schools of the West, to which the Government now appropriates hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Although the great work of the education of Indians must be carried on at the West, it is a very great advantage for the young people of this race to have a school like Hampton, giving opportunities such as can be provided by no Western school for the training of teachers and for instruction in the industrial arts.

The benevolent people from all parts of the country have here invested half a million of dollars in its 16 workshops, farm, and schoolrooms, and to the carrying on of this institution more than $80,000 a year is contributed.

Here between three and four hundred Indian youth have been educated and sent back to their homes, 87 per cent of whom are, by actual investigation, found to be satisfactorily engaged in regular occupations.

The strongest testimony to the value of the school's work has been made by Catholics and Protestants. Gen. Frank Armstrong, formerly United States Indian Inspector, and Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, a Catholic, has repeatedly said that no other school could show such good results.

United States Indian Inspector Major McLaughlin has borne similar testimony. Bishop Hare, of Dakota, in a letter published March, 1886, says: "I can not shut my eyes to the incalculable service which well-conducted Eastern schools have done the Indians, and I am filled with alarm when I hear that their work should be either discontinued or crippled." Later he says: "My yearly visit at Hampton Institute is not made more to see our students than it is to show my gratitude for what the institution is doing for them."

The honorable Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Superintendent of Indian Schools are in thorough sympathy with the school, and believe it to be of great advantage to the Indian schools of the West that a limited number of their more promising pupils should be sent here.

To this institution General Armstrong, its founder and for twenty-five years its principal, gave his life. It certainly seems proper that Congress should appropriate the amount of $20,000 a year in order that the work of this great institution may go on.

I shall be very glad to forward to you documents which will more fully explain the working of the school.

Respectfully, yours, H. B. FRISSELL, Principal.

Mr. DANIEL. I have a similar paper for which I should have made the same request as that which has been made by the Senator from New Jersey, being a memorial setting forth the facts about the Hampton Institute by its principal; but it being, as I understand, identical, I shall not make the request.

Mr. ALLEN. With the consent of the Senator from South Dakota, I will ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of Senate bill 1306.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the request made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that unanimous consent be granted that the two amendments on page 65, from line 1 to line 7, may be passed over for the present. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska. As we are to take up a special order at 4 o'clock, I shall not insist upon going on further with the appropriation bill to-day.

TRANSMISSISSIPPI EXPOSITION AT OMAHA.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1306) to authorize and encourage the holding of a transmississippi exposition at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1898, and making an appropriation therefor. I do not think it will lead to any discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am warmly in favor of this bill. I do not rise, however, solely for the purpose of making that statement, but to say that I shall ask the Senate to take up on Monday next the resolution admitting Mr. Du Pont to a seat in this body as a Senator from Delaware for the purpose of submitting a few remarks thereon. I understand that there are other Senators who also desire to speak on the resolution on that day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska to take up the bill which has been read?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have listened to that bill. It is somewhat involved, and I should like to have time to consider it before we enter upon another exposition. I hope, therefore, without entering a formal objection to the bill, that it may be laid over until some other time. It seems to me it involves the Government in a large expenditure, and it ought to be carefully examined.

Mr. HAWLEY. The matter of expenditure is carefully guarded against and expressly provided for in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have not time to properly consider it now. The hour has arrived for taking up pension bills under the agreement made yesterday, and I hope we shall proceed with that order.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his objection. I was not able to hear the grounds on which the Senator based it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think I would be justified in allowing the bill to be passed now. I hope it may be passed over now and taken up in the morning hour to-morrow. I do not want to displace it, but I want an opportunity to examine it. Congress has been seriously mistaken two or three times in regard to the expense which it was said would be involved in such expositions.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that the bill may be made the special order after the conclusion of the routine morning business to-morrow—between that and 2 o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not to interfere with the appropriation bill?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir; not to interfere with the appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

JOHN C. CUTTER.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to allow me to call up a simple bill to correct a soldier's record. It will take but a moment. It has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Military Affairs, and unanimously passed the other House.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts for that purpose, but give notice that after that bill is disposed of I shall insist on proceeding with the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill No. 83.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 83) for the relief of John C. Cutter, late first lieutenant, Thirty-sixth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry. It directs the Secretary of War to revoke the order accepting the resignation of First Lieut. John C. Cutter, Thirty-sixth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, on January 2, 1864, "for the good of the service," and to issue to him an honorable discharge as of that date; but nothing in this act shall be construed so as to allow him any pay, bounty, pension, or other allowances to which he would not have been entitled under the terms of his original discharge.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the order adopted yesterday the private pension bills on the Calendar will now be considered.

EMMA BROUGH GERARD.

The bill (S. 1414) granting a pension to Emma Brough Gerard was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions, with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "Volunteers," to insert "at the rate of $16 per month"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emma Brough Gerard, widow of C. W. Gerard, deceased, late a private in Company H, Eighty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteers, at the rate of $16 per month.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will consent to increase that amount to $25. The circumstances are peculiar. This lady is the daughter of the late Governor Brough, of Ohio, who was very highly respected. Her husband died recently, leaving her without any property. It seems to me that $25, owing to the circumstances of the case, should be the least that ought to be allowed, and I hope the Senate will indulge me in this request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator move to amend the amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to strike out "sixteen" and insert "twenty-five."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. That amendment will not be resisted by the committee. This woman has two small children.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to strike out the word "deceased," at the close of line 6; it is superfluous.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CELESTHIA A. WHITNEY.

The bill (S. 1148) granting a pension to Celesthia A. Whitney was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Celesthia A. Whitney, widow of Ingerson Whitney, late a private, unassigned, in the Fourteenth Maine Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REBECCA E. KUTZ.

The bill (S. 1036) granting a pension to Rebecca E. Kutz was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Rebecca E. Kutz, mother of George F. Kutz, late of Company F, Seventeenth Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNA C. GARBER.

The bill (S. 725) granting a pension to Anna C. Garber was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 5, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve" and insert "eight"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $8 per month, Anna C. Garber, widow of the late Samuel A. Garber, deceased, late private Company B, Nineteenth Regiment Iowa Infantry Volunteers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the word "deceased," in line 6, after the name "Garber," be stricken out. It is a superfluity.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BENJAMIN F. BELL.

The bill (S. 1523) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Bell was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "seventeen"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Benjamin F. Bell, late second lieutenant, Tenth United States Cavalry, and pay him a pension of $17 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAM P. BARBEE.

The bill (S. 1684) granting a pension to Sam P. Barbee was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-six" and insert "twenty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sam P. Barbee, late of Company B, Second Regiment Kentucky Infantry of Mexican War, at the rate of $20 per month, in lieu of the pension now received.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDREW B. KEITH.

The bill (H. R. 994) granting an increase of pension to Andrew B. Keith was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Andrew B. Keith, late private in Company F, One hundred and twentieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension now paid him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNIE J. CORBETT.

The bill (H. R. 925) granting a pension to Annie J. Corbett, of Providence, R. I., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Annie J. Corbett, widow of William Corbett, late of Company K, Second Regiment of Rhode Island Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KATE A. PITMAN.

The bill (H. R. 995) granting a pension to Kate A. Pitman, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $8 per month, the name of Kate A. Pitman, widow of George Pitman, late a private in Company C, One hundred and second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY ALLARD.

The bill (S. 830) granting a pension to Mary Allard, widow of John Allard, formerly of Company E, Seventh Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mary Allard, widow of John Allard, formerly of Company E, Seventh Connecticut Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend by striking out the word "formerly" and inserting the word "late"; so as to read "late of Company E."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. EUNICE IDA RHOADES.

The bill (S. 1936) to increase the pension of Mrs. Eunice Ida Rhoades was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. A bill identical with the Senate bill has passed the House of Representatives and is on the Calendar, reported from the Committee on Pensions. I move to substitute it for this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). If there be no objection, the House bill will be substituted for the Senate bill.

The bill (H. R. 3749) to increase the pension of Mrs. Eunice Ida Rhoades was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase to $50 a month the pension of Mrs. Eunice Ida Gallup Rhoades, widow of William W. Rhoades, late lieutenant-commander, United States Navy, in lieu of the pension now drawn by her.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that Senate bill 1936, on the same subject, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

MARTHA BROOKS.

The bill (H. R. 2800) granting a pension to Martha Brooks was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Martha Brooks, dependent mother of John M. Brooks, late of Company L, Second Regiment Nebraska Volunteer Cavalry, and to pay her a pension of $12 a month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAROLINE PARKER.

The bill (H. R. 2340) granting a pension to Caroline Parker was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll, at $12 per month, the name of Caroline Parker, dependent mother of Asbury M. Parker, alias Asbery Parker, who enlisted in the Fourteenth Kansas Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RUSSELL R. KING.

The bill (S. 1127) granting an increase of pension to Russell R. King was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "authorize," to insert "and directed"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension rolls the name of Russell R. King, late a member of Company A, Eighth Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SIMEON STEVENS.

The bill (S. 2238) granting an increase of pension to Simeon Stevens was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Simeon Stevens, late of Company A, Fifteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $20 per month, in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILIP T. GREELY.

The bill (S. 856) granting a pension to Philip T. Greely was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Philip T. Greely, late a private in Company D, Twenty-fourth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, at $40 a month, in lieu of the pension which he now receives.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Philip T. Greely."

CORNELIA DE PEYSTER BLACK.

The bill (S. 1117) granting a pension to Cornelia De Peyster Black was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty"; and in the same line, after the word "act," to insert "in lieu of the pension she is now receiving"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Cornelia De Peyster Black, widow of Henry M. EMELINE C. SEWELL.

The bill (S. 2068) to grant a pension to Emeline C. Sewell, widow of Chief Engineer George Sewell, United States Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emeline C. Sewell, widow of George Sewell, late chief engineer, United States Navy, at the rate of $30 per month.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the chairman of the committee why the pension is proposed to be reduced from $50? I will state that while the name is the same as mine I have no knowledge other than the fact that the late chief engineer was one of the most distinguished men in the Navy. He served all during the war. Within five minutes we have passed a bill granting a pension of $50 in the case of an officer of an assimilated rank, that of colonel in the Army. In view of the fact that this gentleman was one of the best men in the Navy, holding some of the highest positions; that he was notoriously gallant, having saved some vessels on certain occasions, and that he left his family destitute, I ask that the amount be restored to $50 per month.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that ought to be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey suggests that the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. JANE L. FAGG.

The bill (S. 1602) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Jane L. Fagg, widow of Col. John A. Fagg, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twelve"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Mrs. Jane L. Fagg, widow of Col. John A. Fagg, who was a soldier in the Mexican war, $12 per month, in lieu of $8 per month she is now receiving.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senate to nonconcur in the committee amendment. The committee have looked the case over carefully since making the report and are satisfied that the amount named in the bill ought to stand.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 4, I move to strike out the word "pay" and substitute the words "place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of"; so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Jane L. Fagg, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I further move to amend by inserting, before the word "twenty," the words "at the rate of"; so as to read:

At the rate of $20 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN E. EVANS.

CAROLINE A. SLOCUM.

The bill (S. 574) granting a pension to Caroline A. Slocum was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred and twenty-five" and insert "fifty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Caroline A. Slocum, widow of Willard Slocum, deceased, late lieutenant-colonel One hundred and twentieth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, at the rate of $50 a month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend by striking out the word "deceased" at the end of line 6.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN S. HALL.

The bill (S. 1269) granting an increase of pension to John S. Hall was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the pension of John S. Hall, heretofore allowed by special act of Congress, to $72 per month for total blindness.

Mr. GALLINGER. Reference to the report accompanying the bill shows that the committee recommended an amendment, in line 5, to substitute the word "fifty" for "seventy-two"; that change was not made in the printed bill. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, before the word "dollars" it is proposed to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "fifty"; so as to read "$50 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY B. HOUK.

The bill (S. 2581) granting an increase of pension to Mary B. Houk was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. A bill identical in terms with Senate bill 2581 has passed the House of Representatives and was reported favorably from the Committee on Pensions. I ask that it be substituted for the Senate bill and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the House bill will be substituted for the Senate bill, which is in exactly the same terms.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 4606) granting a pension to Mary B. Houk was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay Mary B. Houk, widow of Col. Leonidas C. Houk, late colonel of the Third Regiment of Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, a pension of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senate bill 2581, on the same subject, will be indefinitely postponed.

RILEY W. PIERCE.

The bill (S. 2223) granting a pension to Riley W. Pierce was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Riley W. Pierce, a soldier of the Mexican war, at the rate of $8 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. SUSAN M. SESSFORD.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 11, after the word "month," to strike out "from the date of the decease of her son, the said Thomas J. Martin"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susan M. Sessford, the mother of Thomas J. Martin, who died June 3, 1895, and who, at the time of his death, was receiving a pension from the Government under certificate No. 599845, and that she be paid at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ANNIE E. COLWELL.

The bill (S. 2514) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Annie E. Colwell was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. Annie E. Colwell, widow of Thomas W. Colwell, sergeant of Company C, Second Regiment Ohio Infantry, Mexican war, and first sergeant of Company H, Fifth Ohio Cavalry, war of 1861 to 1865, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of the pension she now receives.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGNES A. BLACKMAN.

The bill (S. 2513) to restore to the pension roll the name of Agnes A. Blackman was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. A bill identical with this bill has passed the House, which I report from the Committee on Pensions and ask that it be substituted for the Senate bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the House bill will be substituted for the Senate bill.

The bill (H. R. 2151) to restore to the pension rolls the name of Agnes A. Blackman was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to restore to the pension rolls the name of Agnes A. Blackman, widow of George C. Blackman, brigade surgeon, United States Volunteers, at the rate of $8 per month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senate bill 2513, to restore to the pension roll the name of Agnes A. Blackman, will be indefinitely postponed.

HESTER A. ROBINSON.

The bill (S. 2290) granting a pension to Hester A. Robinson was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Hester A. Robinson, widow of James S. Robinson, late a brevet major-general, United States Volunteers, at the rate of $75 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OLIVER P. GOODING.

The bill (S. 2456) granting a pension to Oliver P. Gooding was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 11, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Oliver P. Gooding, late a brigadier-general, and brevetted a major-general for gallant conduct in action in the late war for the Union, and now an inmate of St. Elizabeth Hospital for the Insane on account of injuries received in battle and under fire in the line of duty, at the rate of $75 per month; said pension, when granted, to be paid to the lawfully appointed guardian of the said General Gooding.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "General," in line 13, and inserting the words "Oliver P."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TALBOT A. ROUTON.

The bill (S. 1508) granting a pension to Talbot A. Routon was announced as the next pension bill on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. That is an adverse report.

Mr. PEFFER. The bill has been adversely reported, and should be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

EDMUND WOOG.

The bill (S. 504) to increase the pension of Edmund Woog was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Edmund Woog, late sergeant in Company C, Sixty-eighth Regiment of New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHNSON HAYS.

The bill (S. 400) granting a pension to Johnson Hays was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, after the words "one hundred and thirty-four thousand and thirty-five," to strike out "is not pensioned"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to add to the disabilities for which Johnson Hays, late private of Company G, of the Seventh Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry Volunteers, now pensioned under certificate No. 134035, "hernia-hydrocele and three broken ribs on left side," and grant him a rate of pension proportioned to the degree of disability to perform manual labor.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend in line 6, after the word "Volunteers," by inserting the word "is," striking out the comma after the word "Volunteers."

Tumblin, of Bradford County, Fla., a soldier in the Florida Indian war of the year 1835, and pay him $20 a month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. JAMES REGAN.

Mr. CLARK. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 1011) for the relief of Capt. James Regan, United States Army.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to the fact that the order under which we are proceeding this afternoon, if I remember it correctly, confines us to the consideration of pension bills. I do not propose to object to this bill, and I think it may be well to let it go through, with the understanding that no further business shall be done this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Wyoming?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1011) for the relief of Capt. James Regan, United States Army, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in line 5, after the name "Regan," to insert "Ninth United States Infantry, as first lieutenant and"; in line 6, after the word "quartermaster," to strike out "Ninth Regiment of Infantry, United States Army," and insert "of said regiment"; in line 10, after the words "part of," strike out "Captain" and insert "said"; in line 11, after the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred and ninety-eight dollars and fifty-seven" and insert "four hundred and fifty-five dollars and eighty-two"; and in line 13, before the name "Regan," to strike out "Captain"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to credit the account of Capt. James Regan, Ninth United States Infantry, as first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of said regiment, for a shortage of subsistence stores at Fort D. A. Russell, occasioned by the dishonesty of Com. Sergt. James Boling, without misconduct on the part of said Regan, with the sum of $2,455.82, and said Regan is discharged from paying the same.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 10, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 9, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WILLIAM H. SCHOFIELD AND OTHERS.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7338) for the relief of William H. Scofield, Jacob Brady, James Ketcham, Annie Booth, as administratrix of the goods, chattels, and credits of George W. Booth, deceased; Wilson P. Billar, Ezra L. Waterhouse, Moses C. Bell, George W. Byles, and George A. Scofield.

Be it enacted, etc., That William H. Scofield, Jacob Brady, James Ketcham, Annie Booth, as administratrix of the goods, chattels, and credits of George W. Booth, deceased; Wilson P. Billar, Ezra L. Waterhouse, Moses C. Bell, George W. Byles, and George A. Scofield be, and they are hereby, released from any liability as sureties on the bond of Neil Hepburn by reason of the defalcation of Neil Hepburn, as late postmaster at City Island, N. Y. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to discontinue as against said William H. Scofield, Jacob Brady, James Ketcham, Annie Booth, as administratrix of the goods, chattels, and credits of George W. Booth, deceased; Wilson P. Billar, Ezra L. Waterhouse, Moses C. Bell, George W. Byles, and George A. Scofield any action that may have been instituted against them to enforce such liability.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been unanimously reported by the Judiciary Committee; and the object in asking its consideration now is that it may be passed before the action against these parties is reached on the calendar of the New York court. The report is long; but I can make briefly any statement that may be required.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the amount involved?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. The bill does not call for any appropriation. It proposes to release these parties from a liability of nearly $5,000. I have conferred with the Sixth Auditor, the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, and it is admitted that this amount accrued against these sureties by the default of that Department in failing to obey the law, which requires the Department to notify the sureties as soon as any liability on their part is incurred. These sureties are a number of poor pilots and oystermen; it required quite a number of them to make up the amount which the bond called for. The default on the part of the postmaster for whom they were sureties occurred from May, 1893, to March, 1894. During all that time, with the knowledge of the Department that the books showed a defalcation on the part of the postmaster, the postmaster himself being meanwhile notified to make good the default, the Department continued to furnish supplies to him until what would have otherwise been a liability of only several hundred dollars was swelled to nearly $5,000. If the prosecution against these sureties be pushed it will wipe out everything they have in the world.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Would it not be a somewhat dangerous precedent to exonerate the sureties from liability in every case of this sort?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. This is an unusual case. The Auditor for the Post-Office Department tells me that since this case occurred such stringent instructions have been given that the case could not be repeated in the administration of the Post-Office Department. The only reason the Department has given to me for not settling this matter without exacting the amount from the sureties is that the law does not allow such settlement to be made unless in the opinion of the Department the amount can not be collected from the sureties. It is admitted in this case that it can be collected, although the collection would wipe out all the little accumulations which have been made by these people during a number of years through building associations or otherwise.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he thinks it right for us to give away in this manner the money of the people of the United States?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. This is not a question of giving away the people's money. If this was a suit brought between private parties there would be a legitimate defense in the courts. It is only because the United States is a party that they are unable to set up the defense which would be admissible in any other case.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. You mean that laches would be a defense in an ordinary action, but not in a case where the Government is involved?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. It has been so held.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let me ask the gentleman, on what principle is the United States Government liable for this defalcation? I have listened to the statements made by the gentleman, but I have been unable to see on what principle he bases his request for this action.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Simply because, if the law had been obeyed by the Department officials, the sureties on the bond of this postmaster would have been notified on the 1st day of July, 1893, and the defalcation would not have occurred.

Mr. McMILLIN. Have you a statement of that from the Postmaster-General?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I have from the Auditor of the Treasury Department for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will you please have that read?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I find that I have not the paper with me, as I thought I had.

Mr. McMILLIN. Did the gentleman submit this to the Postmaster-General?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I submitted it to the Auditor for the Post-Office Department; and the only reason given to me by the Auditor for the Post-Office Department why he would not have the action withdrawn was because, under the statutes, the only ground on which he could do so was inability to collect it from the sureties. He put it wholly on the ground that he had not the power, and that subsequent to this defalcation more stringent orders had been given to prevent the repetition of such an occurrence.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York to let this go over until he has the communication from the Post-Office Department to which he has referred. I think it proper that we should have some such statement from the Department to go with unanimous action releasing these sureties. As indicated by the gentleman, these defalcations are frequent, and we should be careful not to make a precedent that would involve difficulties in the same direction in the Department hereafter.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. The object in pushing it now, I will state to the gentleman, is that an action is on the calendar in New York against these parties that may be reached to-day or to-morrow unless this action is taken.

Mr. McMILLIN. Well, you can abandon the judgment just as well as you can abandon the claim against these people. There ought to be a clear statement of the facts that the responsibility for the defalcation and for the condition that now exists is not with the official himself or his sureties on the bond, but is with the Government of the United States. That ought to go into the record concomitant with the unanimous action that is proposed to be taken here.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to make this inquiry? I find in the report this language:

It also appears that the Post-Office Department failed during all that time to notify the sureties of said postmaster of his neglect to make returns, although the law requires such notification to be given.

Does the law require that?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. That is a fact.

Mr. CANNON. And they did not comply with the law?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. They did not. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is whether the House will give consent to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I think this matter should go over for the reason that we are substantially censuring a Department of the Government without allowing an opportunity to the Department to be heard.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. It has no such effect as that.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. The Postmaster-General has not been heard and no opportunity afforded him to make excuses for the action involved in this transaction. Now, whether that case is going on to trial or not it makes no difference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask to let it go over until to-morrow. I object.

COMPULSORY PILOTAGE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2673); and the gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Florida desires to be heard in opposition.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, having presented the minority report upon this bill, and being possibly more familiar with the facts involved in the hearings before the committee than gentlemen who may have an equally good understanding of the general subject, but who are not members of the committee, I deem it necessary that I should state to the House somewhat of the points involved in the controversy. I shall compress that statement into as few moments as possible, because this is a bill of such far-reaching importance, and gentlemen representing so many districts and parts of the country are directly affected by it, that I shall endeavor to cut short my own time for the purpose of trying to give some opportunity to them to represent the interests of their constituents on the floor of the House.

Now, let the House understand in the beginning what the legislation is that is involved. You have heard a great deal about the bill to abolish compulsory pilotage. Get this clear in your minds, in the first instance, that this bill is one that simply proposes to abolish all that is compulsory on the vessel owners, and that it intends to leave intact and untouched all that is demanded, and all that is obligatory on the pilots of the country.

Now, the interests affected are large and manifold. This is not simply a controversy between vessel owners and pilots, although the controversy would be important if it were no more than that. But this law affects life and property far outside of those interests. This act, if passed, will, in the judgment of every man who is familiar with the conditions, injuriously affect every port upon hundreds of miles of the seacoast of this country. The law will injuriously affect every marine insurance company in this country. It will put at risk and hazard the lives of the seamen of this country, who will have no voice in determining when a vessel shall take a pilot, and who will be left wholly unprotected.

You will understand that under the present State laws a pilot is an officer. He is just like a policeman or a fireman, only that he is officially licensed. He has to serve an apprenticeship. He has to have the pilot boat, the appliances for carrying on his business. He has at all times to be present at the bar. He has to take soundings every day, or every few days. He has to go to every vessel in fair weather or foul. He can not absent himself from the bar. He has got to be there, ready with his services at all times and at all hazards. For those services he receives certain compensation fixed by law. If he catches a vessel in a storm he can not charge her any more because his services are more necessary. He can not exceed the legal fees. If he does not discharge his duties properly, he is liable to be fined or have his license taken away by the board that supervises him. He is an officer, paid certain fees, compelled to perform certain duties, and to be ready to perform them at all times.

Now, a remark was made here upon the floor yesterday in the nature of a sneer, which remark I regretted much to hear. It was that there was a Florida pilot who appeared before the committee and represented the interests of his associates, and who had made representations to some members of the House. If that pilot was here, he could be here only because he had leave of absence from the pilot board. He could not be absent without leave.

And, Mr. Speaker, he is a free American citizen, representing a hardy, courageous, useful body of American seamen, and he had as much right to come before a committee of this Congress and represent the side of his associates as though he had been a millionaire shipowner and had owned a fleet of vessels. [Applause.]

Who appeared before the committee to speak in favor of this bill? My information is that there was not a man who appeared who had not made a fortune in the owning and operating of these vessels. What is the interest that is asking this legislation? It is an interest, and the only interest in the United States, that receives absolutely prohibitory protection. Now, I am not protesting against that. It is outside of my argument. It may be that it is right. It is not the practice of the other maritime nations of the world. England has no such laws, nor has Norway, nor have the other principal maritime nations with which we compete; but it may be that it is right. If so, why is it right? That we may foster and protect a body of American seamen, so that in time of peace the country may have that nursery and supply of seamen to man its vessels and meet its foes in time of war. And yet this interest, exclusively protected, receiving a bounty of millions upon millions of dollars from the citizens of this country for the exclusive benefit of these shipowners—for it is admitted that the freight could be carried much more cheaply in foreign bottoms—asks the passage of this bill.

There is no limit to their demands. They have been relieved of all custom-house dues, and the taxpayers of this country are paying for services necessary to be rendered to them, for which a few years ago the vessel owners paid millions of dollars. I do not complain of that. I want to see the American marine encouraged. What I do complain of is that they come here and demand that another body of American seamen shall be crushed, that the vessel owners may possibly add a few dollars to their profits. Who will the bill benefit? In my deliberate judgment, Mr. Speaker, the bill will benefit no interest whatever in this country, and it will endanger every interest affected. I wish that we could submit this matter to the candid judgment of those members of the House who have no local interest, one way or the other. I should be entirely willing to submit it to any impartial jury.

What is to be the effect of the bill? You will understand that the pilot system in those States south of Maryland is kept up by certain dues on coastwise shipping and foreign shipping. In the States north of that point, as their foreign commerce has increased, and as they have been enabled to support their pilot systems without any dues imposed upon domestic vessels, the States themselves have abolished them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is entirely demonstrated that just as soon as any port can get along by fees on foreign shipping the local interests compel the abolition of the charges upon coastwise shipping. It has been done gradually and safely. As the foreign commerce of each State has increased it has abolished these dues on domestic commerce. It was done but a few weeks ago in Maryland. I have no kind of doubt that as the foreign commerce of Norfolk, Va., increases, in a few years they will abolish the charge upon coastwise vessels. And so, just as fast as the interests of commerce permit, it will be abolished, wisely and safely, as it has been done heretofore, by State legislation. But this bill, ignoring all local conditions, seeks by one sweeping enactment, not undertaking to regulate pilotage, not undertaking to provide for any adequate system, but just simply undertaking to strike down the means by which any system can be supported, at one sweeping enactment impairs or destroys the pilot system of thousands of miles of seacoast.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make my discussion of this matter as brief as possible, and I desire to call the attention of the House to some impartial and very competent authorities that have more weight than anything which I can say. I ask the attention of the House for a moment to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Cooley vs. The Port Wardens of Philadelphia (12 Howard's Report, page 312). The court in that case say:

> Compulsory pilotage laws rest upon the propriety of securing lives and property exposed to the perils of a dangerous navigation by taking on board a person peculiarly skilled to encounter or avoid them; upon the policy of discouraging the commanders of vessels from refusing to receive such persons on board at the proper times and places, and upon the expediency and even intrinsic justice of not suffering those who have incurred labor and expense and danger to place themselves in a position to render important service, generally necessary to go unrewarded, because the master of a particular vessel either rashly refuses their proffered assistance or, contrary to general experience, does not need it.

So, in another portion on this same decision, the Supreme Court says:

> The act of 1789 contains a clear and authoritative declaration by the First Congress that the nature of this subject (pilotage) is such that until Congress shall find it necessary to exert its power it should be left to the legislatures of the States; that it is local and not national; that it is likely to be best provided for, not by one system or plan of regulations, but by as many as the legislative discretion of the several States should deem applicable to the local peculiarities of the ports within their limits.

That was the expression of the Supreme Court of the United States. It has been justified by all experience.

Mr. Speaker, this question was examined in England by a Parliamentary committee. It was given that careful attention that they give such subjects. They are constantly studying, being the largest maritime nation in the world, as to how they can give all possible advantage to their merchant marine; and yet, after a full examination, after the very arguments had been advanced that have been made on this floor, they declined to abolish compulsory pilotage, and the pilotage in England is regulated by local boards, according to the local wants. Mr. Chamberlain, the present secretary for the colonies, introduced a bill in the eighties for the abolition of compulsory pilotage. After full investigation and discussion the bill failed to pass, and he ultimately abandoned and withdrew it. The Bristol Times and Mirror, in speaking upon that subject and in connection with that investigation, says:

> It is a notorious fact that the number of wrecks occurring annually in the United Kingdom is very much smaller in those places on the coast where pilotage is compulsory than in those which are exempt from compulsion.

So about this contention about tugboats. That was fully examined in the British Parliament, and in their report they say:

> The strongest evidence has been given that steam tugs are no substitute for pilots, and that a pilot is as much needed with a steam tug as without.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while I am upon this subject of tugs I will call the facts to your attention right here. When there is fair weather and a vessel approaches a bar, the steam tug may run out and tow her in; but when she needs a pilot, in heavy weather the steam tug can not go to her; you can not have pilots unless you support an adequate pilotage system, and when the pilot is needed most the tug is of no service. Again, one of the greatest services that pilots render is cruising outside in their pilot boats. They give their bearings to vessels, lead them safely to the approaches of the bars before they reach the bars. The tug renders no such service. The pilots not only constantly sound the bars and report them, but they mark the shifting of the sands, and assist the Government buoy tenders in placing their buoys. Then, when a vessel takes a tug she is connected with the tug at the end of 50 or of 100 fathoms of hawser, hardly ever less than 300 yards of rope. The tug may draw from 6 to 8 feet while the vessel may draw from 15 to 20 feet, and that being so, the tug is no guide to her without a pilot. If the hawser parts she would be a wreck in all likelihood unless she had a pilot. The tug can run over portions of the bar that the vessel can not take. The tug in steering around shoals does not necessarily control the course of the vessel. That subject was covered thoroughly by the British Parliament. They reported upon that very question, and their report was that a pilot is as much needed with a steam tug as without.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that this bill would benefit no one. The vessel owner himself would really get no benefit, for it is admitted upon all hands that the pilotage charges are assessed and collected in the freight. There is no question about that. The shipper knows as much of these matters as the vessel owner; and when you abolish compulsory pilotage the result will be only that the shipper will know it and will insist that the pilotage fee shall be deducted from the freight; and when the vessel actually needs and has to take a pilot then it will actually come out of the vessel itself. I wish for a few moments——

Mr. TERRY. It would increase the charges for marine risks, too.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Yes, sir; I will in a moment call attention to that.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman repeat that last remark?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. What I said last was this: That at present, when you come to charter a vessel, you figure it out when you make the charter, and the shipper pays the pilotage fees as a part of his freight or port charges. If compulsory pilotage is abolished the shipper would demand an elimination of the pilotage charges from the freight when he comes to make his charter, and every time the vessel has to take a pilot by stress of weather the pilot charges will fall directly upon her, because there is no allowance for it in her freight.

Again, it is said that the vessel owners are the most interested parties. The vessel owners are insured. Mr. Speaker, we know by all experience that men will take great risks to avoid a small present expenditure. Our laws are based upon that knowledge. Why do you compel the steamboat to carry a licensed engineer? You may say that the owners would not take the risk of the vessel being blown up, that they would employ a competent man; yet the law compels them to employ a competent man. Why do you compel them to carry life-saving appliances? Why do you have boiler and hull inspectors to examine the steamers and order necessary repairs? Because you know from experience that the owners will not do it if they can save a little money for the time being unless compelled by law.

Now, how is the case as to pilotage? The vessel is insured. The master is under pressure from the owners to run her as cheaply as possible. He comes to a port; if he can run in without a pilot he saves a few dollars for the owners. If he wrecks the vessel in trying it, the insurance company pays the loss and the shipper or the insurer of the cargo loses the cargo. But the port is injured in its reputation, and that is our great interest in this matter. It goes out in the commercial reports that a vessel drawing so much water was wrecked in trying to get in to Jacksonville, Fla., for instance. Up go our freight rates; up go our insurance rates. We have to take lighter-draft vessels, because the deeper-draft vessels hesitate to come into the port on account of the danger. The result of it all is that you injure the port and you injure the marine insurance companies. I have not spoken of the lives of the crews, because the life of a sailor is not considered a matter of very great consequence; but there are those seamen on board the vessel who have no voice in determining the question whether they shall be run to destruction in order to save a few dollars for the owner. The captain really has no voice in the matter, because if one reckless captain takes the risk, all the others are obliged to imitate him in order to make as good returns to their owners. The port is injured, the marine insurance company is injured, the lives of the crew are risked, the vessel owners themselves are really injured—and all for what? Simply to give them the possibility on some occasions of saving a few dollars.

I have here a letter from the agent of Lloyds for those coasts, a man who has had as much experience as a marine underwriter as any man in this country. I will ask to have the letter read, but first I will say that everything that has been heard from the marine insurance companies so far as I am aware in respect to this matter is a protest against this bill. I have letters from the marine insurance company men of Savannah, of Charleston, and I have seen a letter from one of the largest marine insurance companies in New York City. These are the men who have to take the risk, and they protest against this bill. I ask the Clerk now to read the letter which I send to the desk.

The letter was read, as follows:

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., March 25, 1896.

DEAR SIR: As I desire to express my views upon the pending pilotage bill in Congress, setting forth the abolition of compulsory pilotage in the Southern States, I write to you with the hope that it will have some weight with the members of Congress.

I have occupied the position of underwriters' agent for domestic and European companies for over forty years, and can safely say that the abolition of compulsory pilotage on coastwise vessels would be detrimental to the maritime interest of the South. During this time I have known of instances where pilots, being entirely disinterested, have risked their lives and property to render assistance to vessels in distress, wholly from a standpoint of humanity, and of my personal knowledge have saved many lives and millions of dollars worth of property; further, I do not consider it safe for a master of a vessel drawing from 15 to 20 feet of water to attempt to follow a tugboat drawing from 6 to 10 feet of water, because the master does not know sets of currents, and should his hawser part, which is about 100 fathoms in length, there would be no alternative for him but to be entirely at the mercy of the numerous currents; whereas should a a pilot be aboard of his vessel he would at once know (being familiar with all of these dangers) what step to take to save his vessel, which as you will see may be the means of saving many lives and thousands of property. I would sincerely trust that Congress will not pass the present pending measure, as I consider that it would be detrimental to the interest of commerce in the Southern States.

I am, most obediently, yours,

THOS. S. EELLS,
Agent American and Foreign Underwriters, including Lloyds, London.

Hon. C. M. COOPER,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I am not very familiar with the navigation laws, living as I do in the interior, but will the gentleman be kind enough to explain why it is that the present pilotage law applies only to coastwise sailing vessels and not to steam vessels?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I am obliged to the gentleman. I had intended to explain that. The gentleman asks why this law applies only to sailing vessels and not to steamers. It is for these reasons: Some years ago a clause which exempted steamers from the obligation to take bar pilots at these ports was slipped into a long bill. The judgment of Congress was never really exercised upon the provision; but let that pass. I doubt the wisdom of that law, but certainly it is much less hazardous for steamers than for sailing vessels to do without pilots. A steamer runs regularly to certain ports. She goes in there every few days, and her officers become actually familiar with the bar, and oftentimes do not really need a pilot, because, going to that port so frequently, they are able to keep up with the changes. A sailing vessel, as a general rule, goes to no regular port, but simply where she is chartered to go. She may enter a given port once a year, once in six months, or once in three years, and therefore her officers can not become competent by experience.

Again, the steam vessel commands her own motive power. She can feel her way along an unknown channel and, if she finds herself in danger of getting aground, she can stop or back. A sailing vessel can not. She is at the mercy of the winds to a certain extent. If she finds herself going upon a shoal, she can not back off. Therefore she has need of somebody to guide her who knows the channel. In point of fact, the officers of steamers which frequent certain ports are often men who have actual practical knowledge of the channel and the bar, yet very often, as I have already said, they do in fact take pilots. It has been stated here that the United States has so improved these bars that pilots are no longer needed. That is not at all correct. The Government has deepened the channels on these bars so that vessels of deeper draft can enter the ports, but that does not lessen the necessity for pilots. A few years ago the Navy Department made an order that our war vessels should not take pilots, because their officers ought to be familiar with the entrances to all our ports, and certainly they have the best charts and better facilities than a merchant vessel has. So many United States war vessels grounded that that order had to be revoked; and now the war vessels of the United States in all these harbors take pilots, who are paid by the Government.

More than that, it has been said that by reason of the marking of buoys, etc., these pilots have become unnecessary. Why, sir, there was presented in these hearings a letter from the commander of the Wisteria, the buoy tender that places the buoys on a large portion of these coasts—a letter stating that the bars are constantly shifting or changing, and it is a fact that the very buoy tenders themselves often take pilots when they go out to correct the bearings of the buoys.

Mr. TALBERT. I agree with the gentleman's view on this question, but I wish to ask him whether the parties who succeeded in getting that provision passed in regard to steamships are not the same who are now seeking to have this bill passed?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I do not know as to that.

I hold in my hand a letter from Maj. F. A. Mahan, of the United States Corps of Engineers, who has charge of the harbor improvements upon a great portion of those coasts where it is said the employment of pilots may be dispensed with; and he states in strong and specific language that such contentions are groundless. I have not time in my few minutes to have this letter read.

I stated a moment ago that it would be injurious even to the ships themselves to abolish this pilotage system. I have here a letter (which I will ask the Clerk to read) from a New England shipmaster, commanding a New England schooner, protesting against the passage of this bill on the ground that it will be injurious even to the vessels of New England.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENSACOLA, FLA., January 23, 1896.

To whom it may concern:

In my opinion, the abolishment of compulsory pilotage, even on coastwise vessels, would be a detrimental move against vessels, from the fact that where there are some ports with fixed channels and are easy to navigate through there are also ports where a person would be compelled to continually sound in order to keep up with the changes, and as the passage of the bill now pending in Congress would allow the shipper to not figure on pilotage among the port charges. When a master of a coastwise vessel was compelled to take a pilot the payment of said pilotage would come directly out of a vessel, it now being paid out of the freight. This port (Pensacola) has such sudden changes on its sand bars that any master coming here would use good judgment in taking a pilot, except possibly under the very best of conditions of weather and a very light-draft vessel. I have been running to this port about thirty years.

Very respectfully,

PETER KAVANAGH,
Master American Schooner Willie L. Newton.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the pilots are earning large sums of money, and that they have not made before the committee any showing of what their earnings are. Sir, a representative of the pilots stated before the committee that in the port he came from no pilot earned more than $1,500 a year; and that is an exceptionally good port. He declared himself willing to answer any questions; but there was no question put to him in regard to that point. The shipmasters did not undertake to show what their expenses and earnings were; but there was read and filed during the hearing a statement showing the earnings of one of those vessels. The returns were surprisingly large, amounting, according to my recollection, to as much as 40 per cent a year. For some reason that statement, although read to the committee, has not been printed in the report of the hearings; therefore, I am not able to state the matter more accurately.

Mr. LOW. Did the gentleman ever know or ever hear of a rich pilot?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I never did. Mr. Speaker, those men earn their daily bread facing the tempest, undergoing the hardships of the winds and the waves; they earn it at the daily risk of their lives. They take care of the widows and orphans of those who perish at one point or another, we might say, almost every day in this service. And one of the things that this bill undertakes to do in effect is to turn adrift upon the cold charities of the world those widows and orphans now dependent upon the pensions contributed from the hard earnings of the self-denying associates of those whose lives have been sacrificed in this service.

Mr. Speaker, why is it that the laboring men all over this country, whether upon the seashore or in the interior, are protesting against the passage of this bill? Apart from the pilots they have not a dollar of interest in it; it does not affect the immediate calling of any great number of them; yet, as I said in the beginning, it is a bill that proposes simply to abolish every provision of law that is compulsory upon the capitalist and the shipowner, leaving in full effect every law that is compulsory upon the pilot and the laborer. That is the reason that the president of the Knights of Labor and the president of the Federation of Labor have opposed this bill in this city. That is the reason that all over this country it is felt, and justly felt, that this is purely class legislation.

Figures have been filed here that were never submitted to the committee—I will not say they were never submitted, but certainly they were never called to the attention of the committee—as to the earnings of pilots in different ports. Those figures could have no value unless accompanied with figures showing the expenses incurred. But in point of fact, so far as I have been able to test the accuracy of these figures, they are not correct. Let me show how inaccurate they are in respect to my own port of Jacksonville, Fla. The St. Johns River has a large coast commerce, but scarcely any foreign commerce. Nine pilots are kept there, that number having been found to be necessary. Gentlemen will understand that these pilots are everywhere under the control of official boards. Apprentices are entered under such control; the pilots are examined and licensed under the authority of such boards. These boards generally consist of merchants and seafaring men and other leading citizens at every port. It is the interest of the mercantile classes to keep down the port charges. They do keep down the pilotage charges. It was stated to you that these charges in Florida are $6 a foot. That was a very unfair statement. That sum is the maximum that can be allowed in any case. In point of fact in Jacksonville, Fla., the charge never exceeds $3 a foot, and is frequently less.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin. Is it not a fact that in the State of Florida no vessel under 6 feet draft has to pay pilotage fees?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I think that is so. But I was going on to say that in the table to which I was referring, a table wholly unofficial, is a statement that at Jacksonville, Fla., pilots receive between $4,000 and $5,000 a year from foreign commerce. I hold in my hand an official certified copy from the records of the board of pilot commissioners at Jacksonville, Fla., wherein it is stated that the total receipts from foreign vessels for the year ended December 1, 1895, that being the latest date of computation, were but $663.65. Now, instead of being nearly $5,000 collected from this source, as has been stated on the floor during this discussion, it is shown by this report to be very little over $600, and that shows the liability to error in making these wild estimates, and also the unreliability of the table of figures which has been set before the House, coming from some unknown source, I know not what, to members of the committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I said that there was nothing said as to the expenses to which these pilots themselves are subjected. I hold in my hand a statement, taken from reliable sources, that shows that the expense of running their pilot boats and keeping them ready at all times to perform the services required of them in Pensacola for the last five years aggregated over $70,000. That is an average of nearly $15,000 a year that they are compelled to pay. So, when you hear large sums named as coming to them in the way of pilot fees and for services performed, you must consider also that there are necessary expenditures to be kept up to enable them to perform the duties on the other hand.

But, sir, I wish to call this to the attention of the House, that, as I have said to you, in every port there is a large and influential and strong local interest devoted to the lessening of the pilot charges just as much as possible, and to abolish them on all classes of commerce as fast as local conditions permit. These charges are wholly paid by shippers, and it is to the interest of the whole mercantile community, as fast as possible, to lessen or abolish them. The experience of every locality has been that in point of fact this very operation has taken place as speedily as may be. All that we ask of the House at present is to leave these forces to work their way down as commerce increases or demands. A few weeks ago they were abolished in the port of Baltimore. It will be done elsewhere as it can be; but to bring in a sweeping bill, making no allowance for local conditions or local necessities or differences of trade or traffic, not undertaking to keep up the pilot system, not undertaking to relieve the pilots of any burden, but simply to relieve the shipowners of paying the small sums required for the expense of keeping up the system, is a most unwise, pernicious, and unjust proposition.

Gentlemen have said that this is a compulsory system. They say that because a ship's owners come forward and say, "Our own officers know the coast and we happen to need no pilot," it is unjust to compel them to pay for one. But that is looking at the question in a very narrow sense. It is only since the war that we have, in my part of the country, made effective our public-school system, and how often have I heard men say who were actuated by an independent spirit, a spirit that had its merits, which in former years led our citizens to lay stress on the doctrine that every man should bear his own burdens, that he should look out for the interests of his own family and maintain at his own expense the education of his own children—how often have I heard men say, "I do not send my children to the public schools; I make no use of those schools, and it is unjust for you to make me pay any portion of the expense." And that is exactly the argument that gentlemen are using to-day.

The pilot system has got to be kept up for the protection of life and property. They must have their boats of a certain sort; they must cruise out to meet incoming vessels in all kinds of weather, whether they are employed or not; they can not charge a penny more than the law allows them to charge, and if they board a vessel in a storm they can not hold her up for ransom, they can not get salvage from her; they have to be there all the time; they must be on hand ready to meet any occasion that arises, and in order to have these pilots for the benefit of commerce generally each vessel pays small sums in the shape of fees. It is unreasonable, therefore, for a vessel owner to say, if his captain happens to know the entrance to the port, "I do not want to pay anything to keep up that system," just as some of our citizens have said, with reference to the public-school system in former days, that because they did not send their children to the public schools it was unjust to make them pay any part of the expense. Why, you might just as well say that the policeman should not be paid except when he is making an arrest. But, whether he is making arrests or not, we have got to keep up the system as a matter of protection. That is precisely the same principle for which I am contending now.

Now, I will put it before the House that the judgment of every man who has expressed himself on the subject, except the shipowner, is against the bill. It came before the last Republican Congress and was defeated.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? What would be the effect on insurance rates if this bill should pass?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. In my judgment, and in the judgment of every marine insurance man that I have heard from as far as I know—I see my friend from Massachusetts shakes his head, but if there are any to the contrary I have not seen them—I have statements here bearing out what I say, that the judgment of every marine insurance man is that it would increase largely the risks, and necessarily the charges for marine insurance.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. How would that increase compare with the pilotage charges that the vessels now pay?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Of course that is largely a matter of guesswork; but the opinion is expressed by a number of these gentlemen, by boards of trade as well as by marine insurance men, and by exchanges, that the rates would be increased to a considerable extent, and would be more burdensome than the compulsory pilotage charges.

Mr. WILLIS. More than an equivalent.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. More than an equivalent; and the protests are not from the pilots alone. They constitute a most meritorious and deserving class, but the protests are from the commercial classes of the whole South Atlantic and Gulf Coast, because their ports will be injured, because their freight charges will be raised, because their insurance will be raised. The protest is from the labor organizations, because the lives of seamen will be endangered, and the means of living of others will be destroyed or largely diminished.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is one ground upon which the monopoly that we give to American vessels can be maintained it is the ground that it is for the protection and maintenance of American seamen; and you have a large body of seamen here who perform many public services. They guard the quarantine interests of this country. They stop the invasion of epidemic diseases. It is necessary to have somebody at these ports to perform this duty, and they are required to assist therein. If you have no efficient pilotage system it becomes wholly voluntary.

They have numerous duties that they perform all the time. You can not have an efficient volunteer pilotage system any more than you can have an efficient volunteer police force or, in a large city, an efficient volunteer fire department.

As to the tugs, they are under no law. If you wipe out the pilots, who keep down the tug rates because they can bring in the vessels without them, then the tug owners can charge what they please. The pilots are limited by law. The tug owners are under no discipline. It is said that pilots are not responsible. We exhibited to the committee bills paid where vessels had got aground while in charge of pilots, and the pilot association paid damages. We exhibited the actual receipts for such payment.

Now, it is unjust to other gentlemen that I should take up more of the time of the House. My argument has been somewhat disconnected, because I have been trying to hasten it. Possibly I should have made it in less time, and in better shape, if I had started out without any attempt to limit myself. I simply say to the House, in conclusion, that we are the people most concerned; that we pay these charges in freight. If we have not yet foreign trade enough to put it wholly upon that, that may be a reproach to our enterprise. It may be simply our misfortune, because we have not the capital; but it is the profit of these gentlemen; and if we furnish their vessels with freight, they certainly ought to be willing to contribute a little something to keep up an adequate pilot system. There ought to be some mutuality, and if they are going to leave the pilots subject to the burdens and obligations of the law, they ought to be willing to take some of that burden upon themselves.

I know that gentlemen upon the other side honestly differ with me; but certainly I was never more sincere in any belief than I am in the belief that this bill will prove an evil to all interests concerned, and will prove a benefit to nobody; that it will work an injury to property; that it will work an injury to commercial interests, and, greatest of all, that it will put in peril the lives of seamen who ought to be protected and who will have no voice in this matter.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has just taken his seat has suggested that he would be glad to leave the determination of this question to those who are wholly disinterested. Now, Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee reporting this bill I came to the consideration of it without any prejudice whatever. My location, of course, has not qualified me from a practical standpoint to speak as other gentlemen can speak with reference to the workings of this system along our coast. But in my investigations, after giving careful attention to the hearings before the committee, it has seemed to me that there are but one or two propositions involved here, and that they are very simple.

The first question is as to whether sailing vessels should have the same privileges and opportunities along our coast that we grant to steam vessels. I have been unable myself to hit upon any good reason why there should be a discrimination against the sailing vessels, which, as it seems to me, are in other respects at a disadvantage in competing with steam craft.

Now, for another thing, it has seemed to me that there has been much confusion in dealing with the general proposition of compulsory pilotage. There is no proposition in this bill to relieve our foreign trade of compulsory pilotage. Much that has been quoted with reference to the importance or the necessity of providing compulsory pilotage has referred, in my judgment, to our foreign trade. Now, I think it is the fact that the only suggestion coming to our committee in opposition to this bill has been from that class and the representatives of that class who are the beneficiaries of the retention of a compulsory pilotage upon the sailing vessels in our coastwise trade.

Now, then, I quite agree with all that has been said with reference to the worthy character of the men who constitute these pilotage associations. I have no doubt that they are worthy of all that they earn. I have no doubt that their necessities are many times great; but, Mr. Speaker, the same suggestion can be made with reference to numerous classes of our fellow-citizens. The proposition is whether by law we should compel the patronage of these men to a certain specific extent annually. Now, we do not do this with reference to any other class of citizens, no matter how worthy we may regard them to be.

Nothing has been established to demonstrate that the passage of this bill will destroy the pilotage system along the coast. Much has been said here in reference to Pensacola. As to Pensacola, Mr. O'Brien, one of the pilots on that bar, who appeared before our committee, represented that every vessel seeking that port would be compelled by the exigencies of the case to take a pilot, and, therefore, in response to a question of the chairman of the committee, Mr. O'Brien said: "It would affect us in this way, the tugboat captains would do the piloting." Not but what the piloting would be done, but that he feared it might be taken from his association and given to some one else. As to Wilmington, the statement was that all except possibly 25 per cent would be compelled to take a pilot. So that the same necessity and patronage for pilotage would exist at those ports as now.

Now, then, it is also represented, and it seems to me singularly represented, that we are to support this compulsory pilotage, because, as Colonel Lamb, of Norfolk, represented, it is a part of the grand idea of protection. If that be true, it is somewhat remarkable that my Southern friends should appear here on this floor as the champions of this grand idea of protection; but that I deny. I say that the principle of protection as advocated upon this side of the House is to give an equal opportunity to all our people, without discrimination.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. I will, if it is a brief one. The gentleman knows that my time is very limited.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Do not the minority in their report say that these tugs can not go out in heavy weather and that the pilot boats have to do the work then?

Mr. PERKINS. Now, Mr. Speaker, with reference to that, I can see why compulsory pilotage as to our foreign trade might be desirable, where a large number of lives are involved and where many interests are concerned that are not concerned in our coastwise trade. But here are small vessels, given to the carrying of heavy freight, with small crews, and every interest involved in that, so far as I know, is here appealing to this House to be relieved of these compulsory pilotage charges. What interests above the interests of those who sail in these vessels and who own these vessels or who are dependent upon the commerce done in these vessels are to be regarded as superior? Mr. Speaker, so far as I am aware, in all the hearings upon this question there was no appeal from any shipping interest, from any marine-insurance interest in opposition to this bill.

I come back to the simple question, then, as to whether, in the interest of those who control this pilotage business at those ports now, we will compel the retention of that pilotage, and if I may be permitted simply to refer to the views expressed by the minority, on page 2, it will be observed that the strength of the argument is based upon our sympathy with those men who now control this business.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can add anything to the words that have just been uttered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS]. As a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and standing upon the floor of this House as the only Democrat elected from the six New England States, it seems to me proper that I should give utterance in the few moments at my disposal to the views of the people of that section of the country upon this bill.

As has been stated upon the floor of this House, almost all the coastwise vessels now plying from one port to the other in these United States are owned in New England. Judging from the statements and from the letters and from the resolutions that I have received from every State in New England, from every chamber of commerce, and from every marine association, all New England is in favor of this bill.

Those gentlemen who are against this measure have dwelt with great stress upon the privileges and the immunities that sailing vessels obtain; and yet with all these privileges, with all the immunities that have been granted to them by the United States, in the year 1874 there were 28,000 vessels under sail, and in the year 1895 that number had decreased to 17,000. Does not that show that some further privileges and some further benefits should be given them? Years ago it was the proud privilege of every American going to a foreign port, in Europe, in Asia, or in Africa, to see the waters dotted with the white sails of American vessels, to see the Stars and Stripes [applause], Old Glory, proudly floating from the topmast of every ship; but now that has all gone, and the American merchant marine has disappeared from the waters of the earth, and practically all that we have left is the small number of vessels that ply from one port of our country to another.

American sail vessels have been driven almost wholly out of the foreign trade. In 1894 only 684 out of our total of 16,686 sail vessels made voyages to Europe, Asia, Africa, South America, Hawaii, and Oceanica. The coasting trade is thus almost the sole means of supporting our sailing vessels, their owners, masters, and seamen, and the tendency of existing law is to destroy that means of support by the imposition of heavy pilotage charges, from which steam vessels are exempt.

The present laws of some States tend to insecure navigation, as they do not require that a State pilot shall actually be employed, but enable the master, by paying a lump sum, to navigate without a pilot for the period of one year.

The proposed bill restores equality of treatment of sail and steam vessels. It reduces charges on American vessels, and thus establishes more favorable conditions for competition between vessels and railroads. It tends toward reduced cost of transportation. It tends toward safer navigation by providing for the examination of masters and mates of sail vessels as to their qualification to pilot their vessels, while now they are subject to no such tests.

The millions of dollars spent within the last twenty years on improvements of harbors where these charges are now imposed should have rendered these harbors easier of access and reduced the necessity for State pilots.

The principal ground of opposition to the bill is that the receipts of pilots will be so reduced that an efficient pilotage system can not be maintained. Assuming that the present receipts are necessary to maintain the several pilotage systems, the amount may be maintained, if necessary, by an increase of pilotage charges on vessels in foreign trade, which are mainly foreign vessels. The situation created by the present Federal and State laws not only discriminates against American sailing vessels in favor of American steam vessels, but, if the argument of the opponents of the measure holds good, lays a taxation on American vessels in order that foreign steamers may pay less pilotage than would otherwise be necessary, and thus discriminates against American and in favor of foreign vessels.

Such pilotage charges are against the public interest, as the people of all sections are interested in removing from commerce unnecessary burdens. The law, as it stands at the present time, exacts payment for pilots' services neither needed nor in a great many cases rendered; it discriminates without reason between classes of vessels. It maintains a monopoly, as compulsory pilotage is exacted now in only 9 States out of the 45; and for the benefit of a few pilots of a few ports it puts the vast coastwise commerce of the United States under contribution. The decadence of our foreign-going merchant marine has left the coastwise fleet the only source from which to recruit our Navy during war. The present law operates in favor of the rich as against the poor, inasmuch as coastwise tonnage is generally held by small owners in multiples of sixty-fourths, while on the other hand coastwise steamers, which for many years have been relieved from this tax, are, in the main, owned and controlled by powerful corporations, and it is but simple justice that the small investor should be put on the same footing as the large and powerful corporations. [Applause.]

To show how unjustly our sailing vessels are discriminated against it is only necessary to cite this instance: A steamer can make 20 trips between New York and Charleston in a year and pay no pilotage fees. The schooner Thomas A. Ward, from January, 1895, to January, 1896, paid Charleston pilots $1,298.23, and in no instance was the service of a pilot asked for or required; yet this vessel paid this tribute because the laws of South Carolina demanded it. From statistics gathered from the collectors of customs in the different Southern ports it is shown that 76 per cent of the vessels entering and clearing at these ports employed towboats manned by skillful pilots, yet they were compelled to employ pilots in addition and to pay this pilotage tax whether the services of the pilot were accepted or not.

To show how great an expense and burden this system is it is only necessary to state that the pilotage charges average 33 per cent of the net freight. The Constitution of the United States says that no State, without the consent of Congress, shall lay duty on tonnage, and the levying of this tribute by these 9 States is to my mind a clear infraction of the Constitution.

Every vessel carrying a ton of coal, a bale of cotton, or any of the necessaries of life from one of these Southern ports to the great industrial centers of the North is compelled to pay this extra tax, and as a consequence the burden falls unjustly on the poor people of the North, who are made to pay a higher price for these great necessities. [Applause.]

The district which it is my privilege and honor to represent on the floor of this House is composed largely of working people, persons who toil from early morn until late at night to earn their daily bread, and it is only with the greatest care and economy that they save enough to educate their children to the proper responsibilities and duties of American citizenship.

To this great class of the American people every cent cheapened in the matter of transportation charges means another cent saved, and when you remove these unjust taxes on the American sailing vessel you immediately lay at the door of every laboring man in this country cheaper coal and cheaper food products.

I appeal, therefore, to the members of this House, in behalf of the great wage-earning class of our population, to remove the fetters that now bind our merchant marine and give the struggling sailing vessel the same rights and privileges that are now enjoyed by the more powerful steam vessel and the gigantic corporations behind it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, in five minutes' time I can not discuss the principle involved in this bill. There might be a time when, under other and different circumstances, I would support this bill, but I am opposed to it at this time and under existing circumstances for reasons which I will briefly state. We are in the midst of a condition of depressed labor. From one end of this country to the other the laboring man is either without employment or without adequate and just remuneration for his labor. I know that some of our friends on the other side are inclined to say that we are entering upon a period of better times. I do not find it so among the laboring men whom I represent. In my district there are 9,000 coal miners, men who work by the ton, mining coal out of the earth for a price less than one-half of a fair remuneration for their labor, taking into account, first, the rate per ton, and second, the limited employment which they are enabled to obtain.

Now, these people—and they are only types of a mighty host in the United States, found not only in Ohio and in the West, but in Massachusetts and the East—these people are looking to this Congress to do something for them. This Congress is not going to do anything for them, but certainly they are not expecting that this Congress is going to interfere with long-established rules of labor in any section of the country to the detriment of the laboring men of the country. I do not stop here and now for want of time to defend their views of this subject. Nobody knows better than the gentleman whose handsome face is in front of me at this moment [Mr. SIMPKINS] how difficult it is to argue upon principle with a hungry man, and when the representatives of millions of laboring men are called upon they heed the voice of labor and laboring men.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. I understand that 17,000 ships, as has been stated on this floor, were thrown out of commission last year. I understand that the compulsory pilotage fees amount to about one-third of the total net receipts of this class of vessels. Now, is not that discouraging to the shipping interest, and is it not discouraging to labor?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is assuming as a fact that which has been vigorously disputed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. LOW. The statement, I think, was that that number of ships had been thrown out of commission in twenty years.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Ah, in twenty years. That makes quite a difference. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] exhibited here yesterday the orders that are being given for new ships, which would indicate quite a different condition of things from what is implied in the question of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Every week you will find in the Marine Journal a page of orders for new ships with the names of the people ordering them and the names of the builders.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; and every week you will find lists of other industries closed up and broken down. Now, my proposition is this; here is a law in relation to pilotage which has been in existence for a quarter of a century. Ever since I have been in Congress bills to repeal it have been here, and ever since I have been in Congress they have been defeated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I certainly have not occupied five minutes. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the ruling of the clock that the Chair goes by.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That may be so, but other gentlemen have occupied the time.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope it will be longer than the last five minutes. [Laughter.] I was going on to say, Mr. Speaker, that it is possible that all that has been said in advocacy of this bill is true, but even if that be so, why can not these shipowners wait? I put that question in the hearing of the representatives of the laboring men of this country.

A MEMBER. They have waited twenty years.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They have waited twenty years, and they have done pretty well by it. They have had the exclusive monopoly of all the coastwise trade of this country, the greatest trade that we have. While the laws of internal transit lay the whole business open to competition, the laws of coastwise transit close the doors to competition.

Mr. SIMPKINS. There are 4,000,000 of tonnage engaged in competition with themselves in the coastwise trade——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well.

Mr. SIMPKINS. Over ninety acts have been passed by the Congress of the United States—you will find that in the statement of Mr. Blaine in his reply to Mr. Beck in the Senate—over ninety acts of Congress have been passed for the regulation of internal transportation. Many millions of dollars have been given to aid the railroads. These railroads come in direct competition with the coasting vessels——

Mr. GROSVENOR (interposing). Mr. Speaker, I can not allow the gentleman to use up the remainder of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPKINS. I simply want to ask the gentleman if that is not competition enough?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will answer the gentleman. During the period he has spoken about, the railroads of this country have reduced their freights on the average down to 22 per cent of the maximum rate in 1867, and during that time 270,000 men employed upon the railroads of this country have had their wages reduced to less than 50 per cent of the former rate, and during that time the men who provide the articles for transportation upon the railroads and the ships have had their wages cut down in like proportion. Subsidies to railroads have nothing to do with my proposition, which is this: In the midst of a time when labor is depressed and when the laboring men of the country are prejudiced against an enactment like this, why is it necessary to press this bill upon the Congress of the United States? Why not wait, and in the fulfillment of the prophetic vision that seems to be ahead of us, when better times shall come, why not then regulate this matter and let the oncoming tide of prosperity be joined by the benefit to the shipping along the northern Atlantic coast? [Applause.]

That, Mr. Chairman, is all I desire to say. The residue of my time I yield back to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. PAYNE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ELLETT].

Mr. ELLETT of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to read resolutions passed by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Richmond, Va., favoring the passage of the bill now before this body:

Resolutions adopted by the Richmond Chamber of Commerce February 17, 1896.

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Richmond Chamber of Commerce indorses most heartily the bill now before the United States House of Representatives, No. 2673, which has for its object the abolition of compulsory pilotage on coastwise sailing vessels, and respectfully petition the Senators and Representatives from Virginia to give their support to said measure.

The compulsory payment by the masters of coastwise sailing vessels of compulsory pilots' fees for services which are not needed nor even rendered is an unjust tax upon the citizens and an onerous burden upon the commerce of the country. The fact that such an exaction is permitted by law in no way relieves it of its injustice, but demands its speedy repeal by the law-making power.

S. H. HAWES, President.

Attest:
R. A. DUNLOP, Secretary.

These resolutions, Mr. Speaker, come from a body composed of the most conservative, intelligent, and substantial business men of Virginia; men thoroughly acquainted with the true interests and rights of their community and State, and knowing those rights dare maintain them. Their ports are not only Richmond, but West Point and Newport News as well, and they are largely interested in commerce.

Sir, a great deal has been said about labor organizations opposing this bill. I can state, without fear of contradiction, that the 100,000 inhabitants of the city which I represent are almost to a unit, laboring men as well as business men, in favor of this bill. The farmers of my entire district favor it. And why? All take a broad view of the commerce of this country. They know that it will be beneficial to Southern trade to have as free ingress and egress into and from her ports as possible. They know that while this tax may now be paid by the shipowner it must in the end come back upon the consumer in that portion of the country which I represent. They know but too well that at certain seasons of the year, because of this heavy tax, it is almost impossible to get sailing vessels to come to our ports at all.

Mr. BRUMM. As a matter of information, may I ask the gentleman——

Mr. ELLETT of Virginia. I have but little time allotted me.

Mr. BRUMM. Why do not your people go to the State for relief?

Mr. ELLETT of Virginia. They do go there, and there they are asked why they do not come to Congress, which, under the Constitution, has full control of this subject. It is unfortunate that both there and here the political influence and activity of the National Pilots' Association is so great with both parties that it is almost impossible to secure a fair, impartial, and businesslike consideration of this question.

Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said by the opponents of this bill about States' rights being involved in this matter. This is a specious claim, and every lawyer when he makes it knows that it is incorrect. They must or should know that the fathers of the Constitution, who so carefully strove in every way to preserve and protect the rights of the States, delegated to the General Government the absolute control of the foreign and interstate commerce of the country.

The provision of the Constitution is as follows:

Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes. (Constitution United States, item 3, section 8, Article I.)

In colonial times such of the thirteen colonies as established pilotage systems confined their operations to the shipping trade to and from their own ports. They protected their systems by making it a punishable offense for anyone to act as a pilot for any such vessel without their license.

After the Declaration of Independence, although the Colonies succeeded to the rights of the Crown, an independent exercise of sovereignty over the waters in the several States would have been inconsistent with the Union, whether we regard their confederation as an alliance of thirteen States or as a single nation. But when the Constitution was adopted and the Federal Union formed in 1789, if such powers existed in the States, their exercise was precluded by the common right of all the States to free and equal navigation in all the public navigable waters of the United States.

The First Congress, as early as August 7, 1789, which was assuredly familiar with the subject, passed as its ninth act a bill entitled "An act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers."

Among its provisions it provided that—

Until further provision is made by Congress all pilots in the bays, inlets, rivers, harbors, and ports of the United States shall continue to be regulated in conformity with the existing laws of the States, respectively, wherein such pilots may be, or with such laws as the States may, respectively, enact for the purpose. (Act 9, August, 1789, page 54; Revised Statutes United States, section 4235.)

The navigable waters of the United States are defined, namely:

And they constitute navigable waters of the United States within the meaning of the acts of Congress, in contradistinction from the navigable waters of the States, when in their ordinary condition, by themselves or by uniting with other waters, they form a continued highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water. (The Daniel Ball, 10 Wallace, 563; The Monticello, 11 id., 411.)

The act of 1789 is a clear and authoritative declaration that the Federal Government, under the said provision of the Constitution, reserved to itself the control of all pilotage legislation, and by this act permitted the several States to pass laws regulating pilotage in their ports until such time should arrive when Congress would consider the subject and pass general laws in respect to the same.

When this act became a law the seacoast of the United States was limited from Maine to Georgia. Neither Louisiana nor Florida had been purchased; the boundaries of Oregon were unascertained and undetermined; Texas had not made its gallant fight for and achieved independence, and California was not acquired until more than a half century thereafter.

Mr. Speaker, it has been the policy of this Government since the adoption of the Constitution to have the navigable waters of the United States as free as possible, and to have all necessary charges on these waters as uniform and without preference as the circumstances would permit. Sections 8 and 9, Article I, of the Constitution provide:

That all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage.

Again the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the River Ohio provided that—

The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence and the carrying places between the same shall be the common highways and forever free as well to the inhabitants of said territory as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other State that may be admitted into the confederacy, without any tax, impost, or duty therefor.

Now, while it will be observed from the above quotations that the policy of the United States has been to make all laws governing interstate or foreign commerce uniform and without preference among the States, yet in the wisdom of Congress in 1789 it was determined to leave pilotage to be regulated by the laws of the respective States. This was done then because of the necessity of leaving it to local pilots and giving them every encouragement in the then condition of commerce, and also because of the condition of the various harbors, rivers, and channels, which were as nature made them, full of rocks, windings, and other impediments to commerce. Now, however, things have changed. Over $100,000,000 has been expended in straightening, dredging, and deepening Southern channels. Dangerous places have either been removed or marked by light-houses and buoys, until any master of a vessel can take her, either himself or with the aid of a tug, into port without assistance. Especially is this the case at Hampton Roads, where any mariner may sail in as easily and safely as any member of this House can walk up Pennsylvania avenue from the Capitol to the White House. In fact, I submit that the course of the mariner would be the safer of the two under certain conditions of the Congressman in the dark hours of the night. The conditions having changed, I therefore submit that the old law should be repealed, and the General Government should enact one law to apply to all ports of this country.

Again I submit that the law as it exists in those States where licenses are granted is unconstitutional. In many States laws were originally passed which exempted vessels plying between their own ports and those of neighboring States. When these laws were declared unconstitutional because repugnant to that clause of the Constitution forbidding any State to give a preference to the ports of one State over those of another by any regulation of commerce, several States, including Maryland, Virginia, and Georgia, in order to get around these decisions, passed laws permitting the pilots to license sailing vessels for a year, scaling the tax according to the registered tonnage of the vessel, as, for instance, in Virginia, it is 10 cents per ton on her registered tonnage. This, I maintain, is in conflict with that provision of the Constitution which says:

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage. (Section 9, Article I, Constitution of the United States.)

The law remained substantially as passed in 1789 until 1837, when New York pilots had a complete monopoly, and they became both so exacting and negligent that because of the loss of the emigrant ships Bristol and Mexico on Long Island public attention was drawn to them and the State of New Jersey established a pilot system, broke up the New York monopoly, and Congress passed a law empowering the master to take a pilot from either State when going to a port situated on waters constituting the boundary between States. (Revised Statutes United States, section 4236.)

In 1871 Congress again intervened and again assumed partial control of the subject by enacting a law abolishing compulsory pilotage as to all coasting vessels propelled by steam. (Revised Statutes United States, section 4438 et seq.)

Having reviewed the historical and legal aspect of this subject, let us now consider exactly what this bill seeks to do and the justice of, and reasons for, doing it.

This bill simply provides that coastwise sailing vessels shall be put on the same basis as our steam vessels, by allowing the licensing of their masters or mates to pilot their own vessels when found competent by the local inspectors, as contained in section 4442 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and by exempting them from the payment of State pilotage when not used and when their vessels are towed by tugs under the charge of United States pilots.

This bill in effect provides that an American coastwise sailing vessel already adequately piloted by a United States pilot shall not be obliged to pay a State pilot who has performed no service for the vessel, and whose services are not needed.

That the permissive act of Congress of 1789 that—

All pilots in the bays, inlets, rivers, harbors, and ports of the United States shall continue to be regulated in conformity with the existing laws of the States, respectively, wherein such pilots may be, or with such laws as the States may, respectively, hereafter enact for the purpose, until further legislative provision shall be made by Congress—has now become an inequitable discrimination by eight States against the citizens of the rest of the Union engaged in the coastwise sailing trade; and besides, as the bill simply embodies the well-recognized rule of justice that no person should be compelled to pay for services not accepted nor rendered, it is incumbent on those who oppose it to give most cogent reasons for retaining laws which give State pilots authority to collect fees from vessels already adequately piloted that do not accept nor need their services.

No work, no pay, is the principle of this bill. The reasons why in justice and right this bill should be enacted into law by Congress are as follows:

First. The law should be the same with sailing vessels as with steam vessels. No reason exists why steam vessels should be released from the payment of pilotage fees while sailing vessels are held to such payments. Especially is this true and the unfairness of the distinction made more glaring now that steam tugs with two United States licensed pilots on board are ever at hand to tow any and all vessels needing their services into port. It is urged, Mr. Speaker, that these State pilot laws keep down the price of towage. The answer to this is that competition in this, as in every other business, will keep the towage at a reasonable figure. The absurdity of this argument will be at once noted when the cost of pilotage and towage are compared as given in the following table.

The following is a comparison of pilotage and towage, copied from the vessels' accounts, for entering and leaving the following ports, and shows the onerous tax upon those engaged in this trade:

Schooner Oscar C. Schmidt, drawing 13½ feet:

Pilotage in and out	99.00
Towage in and out	56.00

The foregoing charges in said ports show what the pilotage fees amount to on vessels when towed, and it is apparent no service was rendered by the State pilot. The distance is also shown, so that anyone can see how long it would take to earn the double fees which are exacted from the vessels in the coastwise trade.

In Hampton Roads the difference in pilotage and towage is about the same; in nearly every case the pilotage exceeds the towage more than 100 per cent.

It is certainly a rank injustice to exempt steamers, which are usually owned by wealthy corporations, from contributing to the support of State pilots, and at the same time compel the comparatively poor owners of small coastwise sailing vessels, doing business in competition with these steamers, and often owned in thirty-second parts by small owners, to pay this tax, so entirely unnecessary.

Second. The law as it exists is unjust, as it obliges the coastwise trade, who do not need pilots, to pay for the maintenance of a staff of pilots for those who do need them—namely, foreign vessels.

Moreover, inasmuch as three-fourths of the vessels which require pilots are foreign vessels, the practical effect of the laws of the eight States which this bill would modify is to compel the owners of American vessels to contribute to the support of pilots for foreign vessels. We know of no reason why foreign vessels should not pay the expense of maintaining pilots for their own use if they need them.

Experience has shown, in the States which have no laws compelling coastwise vessels to pay State pilots not used, that all the ports are as well supplied with necessary pilots as they were before, although generally the number is less than before the change, for the reason that now the supply is only equal to the demand, whereas when compulsory fees existed the temptation existed to maintain numbers beyond the demand.

In Hampton Roads, however, there has been such an increase of the number of vessels that the 28 pilots now employed would be kept busy, as they are now, from year's end to year's end, and would, with compulsory pilotage abolished, still derive handsome yearly incomes from the foreign pilotage alone. Maryland has taken this view, and her legislature has just abolished compulsory pilotage on coastwise vessels.

Third. That the compounding of pilotage fees by the pilot authorities in the States of Virginia and Georgia in granting exemptions to shipmasters upon payment to them of a specified sum is an unconstitutional exaction, as we have before seen, is repugnant to our institutions, and is a burden on interstate commerce.

The Virginia law covering this point is as follows:

PORTS OF VIRGINIA.

SEC. 1967. Pilots shall appoint agents, one for Norfolk City and one for Richmond, who shall grant licenses for coasting vessels trading in all the rivers of this State; for which license such agent shall receive 10 per cent per ton for one year; and coasting vessels having such licenses shall be free to sail without pilots to or from sea; but all vessels sailing under coasting licenses of the burden of 70 tons or more, coming from or going to sea, without having obtained a license from such agent shall be subject to the same regulations and pilotage as registered vessels belonging to citizens of the United States.

SEC. 1990. Nothing in this chapter shall be construed to apply to vessels bound for any point on the Potomac; and no vessel bound to or from any point on the Potomac shall be required to pay pilotage.—Code of Virginia.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that in Virginia we have not only this unconstitutional tax provided by section 1967, but the remarkable anomaly of a State discriminating between her own ports. All points on the Potomac, such as Alexandria, are free, while Richmond, Fredericksburg, and West Point, and all other ports in Virginia are still taxed.

This state of affairs was brought about in 1872, when the pilots, represented by Mr. John S. Wise, in order to prevent the total abolition of compulsory pilotage in Virginia, compromised with the representatives of Alexandria by excluding them from the provisions of the State law.

Comment on the unfairness of such a status of affairs is entirely unnecessary.

Let us revert for a moment to section 1967. If permission be granted to a licensed American vessel of 1,000 tons burden to navigate American waters said vessel will be compelled to pay $100 to go up James River to Richmond, or to Newport News, or Norfolk. and if the master desired to go to Savannah the permission to navigate the river leading thereto would cost him $267, making the sum of $367 (and not one particle of service rendered), to be deducted from the gross earnings of the trip.

There is no service rendered for the money paid, nor is any examination made as to the qualifications of the master to act as his own pilot; in fact, the master is not known in the matter; his name does not even appear on the permission granted. The printed forms are left with ship brokers and commission merchants to be filled in whenever a master in the coastwise trade desires to purchase permission to sail over certain waters of the United States, and there is hardly a vessel that is engaged in the coastwise trade that does not some time during the year visit Newport News, Lamberts Point (Norfolk), or Savannah.

Mr. Speaker, I can not better impress this House with the injustice and folly of continuing compulsory pilotage than by reading the following extract from the testimony of Mr. John A. Curtis, a prominent citizen of Richmond, and then a member of the Virginia legislature, before the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the Fifty-first Congress. Mr. Curtis was born in Hampton, Va., the home of the pilots, and has been a seafaring man nearly all of his life. Mr. Curtis said:

They keep a pilot boat at Cape Henry. The Virginia law provides that every vessel inward bound shall take the first pilot that approaches and offers his services at Cape Henry, bearing west of south. Therefore, belonging to one association, they lay their boat within that line, at the gateway of the waters of that State, and demand tribute of every vessel that passes, whether any service is rendered or not.

I have a statement here of the income for the year ended October 1, 1889, which is authentic, certainly, as to Newport News, that they receive the sum of $95,763.43. Out of that amount $25,000 was received from American coasting vessels, for which the said pilots rendered no service. If that amount were taken from the pilots, which would be done under the proposed bill, they would then have $70,000 to divide between 27 men. * * * The pilots have been increasing in business for years. * * * When Newport News and Lamberts Point became coaling points for steamers crossing the Atlantic, the business of pilotage increased wonderfully. They are busy from one year's end to the other. * * * We have pleaded with these people and said to them, "You are making a far better living than the majority of the people with the same amount of capital, and we beg you, as people of this State, to go to the legislature of Virginia and ask to have that act repealed levying this tax upon the coasting vessels trading in the waters of Virginia, for which the people of Virginia must pay." * * * I am not here to take away the living of any of the pilots, * * * but I ask that a tribute which Virginia has imposed upon American vessels, shall be taken off, in order that we may have more vessels in Virginia waters, where we need them, and that our people may have better facilities for sending their produce to Northern markets. Our farmers are poor and are getting poorer daily. They have gone to getting out railroad ties, lumber, and staves to send North, in order that they may realize ready money. It is for them it is asked that every obstruction be taken away, in order that these vessels may be free to trade in the State of Virginia and carry this freight of my people at less rates than they are with this burden of taxation put upon them by the State of Virginia, * * * and for which no service is rendered. * * *

Mr. Speaker, thus do the discriminating and unjust pilot laws of Virginia weave a web around the mouth of Chesapeake Bay and Hampton Roads, the grandest and most accessible harbor on the Atlantic seaboard, and permit 28 pilots there to lie in wait for their prey—the American sailing vessel—the home and nursery of American seamen, and to pounce upon them and sap their lifeblood, greatly to the injury of Virginia's people and Virginia's commerce.

Fourth. That in the United States the owner is not exempted from liability for the acts of the pilot. In England and Germany compulsory pilotage carries with it exemption from liability. Not so here.

A shipowner is not exempted from liability for the damage done by his vessel when the same is placed in charge of a pilot by compulsory Federal or State laws. (Steamship China vs. Walsh et al., 7 Wallace, 61.)

There is no immunity to the owner nor responsibility of the pilot other than a slight fine or suspension. This followed to its logical conclusion is absurd and most injurious to the interests of commerce.

Fifth. That the masters and mates engaged in the coastwise trade, from their acquaintance with their vessel and crew and experience in these waters, are more capable to handle the vessel, even in the pilotage waters of said States, than a pilot to whom the vessel is strange; and to compel the master to surrender her to the pilot sometimes leads to disaster.

Sixth. That the system tends to create a body of protected monopolists, whose interests are not identical with those of the shipowners, who know they must be employed, and whose independent services are probably not so readily or effectively given as if their employment depended on their efficiency. In Virginia the pilots are appointed by a board of commissioners appointed by the courts of the city of Norfolk and the county of Elizabeth City; but no one can apply for a license unless he has served a five years' apprenticeship to a Virginia pilot; and as there is no law compelling a pilot to accept an apprentice, the present pilots, who all belong to one association, have a close monopoly of the most pronounced type. Unlike most public servants, they make no report or return to the Commonwealth, but all fees collected go into their private pockets and not one cent into the State treasury.

I am well acquainted with many of the Virginia pilots and I esteem them to be a brave and worthy band, but it is wrong to permit them to tax others for their own benefit when no service is rendered. It is wrong in principle to permit 8 States thus to levy tribute on the commerce of the other 37.

It is wrong in principle to permit one citizen to levy a tax on another citizen when the first citizen renders no service whatever to the one compelled to pay the tax. The mere statement of such a proposition is abhorrent to every sense of equity and justice and totally repugnant to the principles of our republican form of government, the foundation stone of which is the equality of every citizen under the law.

Every farmer, every miner, every laborer, as well as the merchant and manufacturer, and, above all, every consumer of all their products in the Southern States, are interested in cheap freight rates, and are therefore vitally concerned in maintaining the commerce of our Southland and in securing to all shippers of freight the amplest and cheapest transportation facilities. The Southern States have too long allowed such antiquated laws to impede their progress and general prosperity. Compulsory pilotage on coastwise vessels has been abolished everywhere in this country on the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards save in the South. Maryland has just indorsed the wisdom of this bill by abolishing compulsory pilotage. Why should not Congress make the law on this subject uniform throughout the land? By so doing not only will all classes of our citizens be greatly benefited, but another blot will be thus removed from the symmetry of our Federal laws. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ELLETT] has expired.

Mr. ELLETT of Virginia. I trust the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will grant me two minutes more.

Mr. PAYNE. I can not do it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman on the other side should use his time, and that we on this side should close the debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Five minutes remain to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. COOPER], and twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I yield one minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT].

[Mr. ELLIOTT of South Carolina addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. TYLER. Mr. Speaker, of course it would be utterly impossible for me to make anything like a proper argument in support of the position I take on the pending bill within the short time allowed to me. It is enongh, I think, for me to call the attention of the House to two salient objections to the passage of the bill, and before doing that I want to refer briefly to what my colleague from Virginia [Mr. ELLETT] has said in regard to the interest taken by the people of his metropolis for the repeal of the compulsory pilot law.

If you refer to the statistics appearing in the report of the majority of the committee upon this bill you will see that at Richmond, Va., under the head of "Estimated pilotage receipts from tonnage entered from and cleared to foreign ports for the year ended June 30, 1895," that it amounted, in sailing vessels, to 3 vessels entered and 2 cleared; in steamers, to 8 entered and 15 cleared, and the total amount of pilotage fees collected at that port during that period was $1,530.

I have the honor of representing the greatest seaport town in Virginia, that guards the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay, and also that young city whose site was but yesterday a mere uncultivated old field, but which has become to be, with a magic growth, one of the most flourishing cities in our Republic; I refer to Norfolk and Newport News; and I will show the interest that our people take in this question because of the great interests of commerce at these points.

At Newport News the number of foreign sailing vessels entering that port during the same period to which I have referred was 11, with a registered tonnage of about 8,000; cleared from the port 28, with a tonnage of more than 22,000; of steamers, 81 entered and 149 cleared, with a tonnage of 247,000. The receipts that year from pilot fees amounted to $19,146. In Norfolk, during the same period, the number of vessels entering that port—sailing vessels—was 12, and 60 cleared therefrom (these are foreign vessels; I wish to call the attention of the committee to that fact), and of steam vessels the number entering was 31, the number cleared 79, with a tonnage of 122,000. The amount of pilotage fees collected was $13,000, and the fees collected at the two points named represent interests in favor of continuing the compulsory pilotage system, as against the $1,500 paid by Richmond.

Norfolk and Newport News, with their immense foreign and coastwise trade, with their thousands of merchants and shippers dependent for their prosperity upon marine traffic, desire that the present excellent pilotage system shall remain under local control, while Richmond, an inland city, having comparatively no interest in the matter, bearing an infinitesimal portion of the cost for the maintenance of the system, appears on this floor advocating the passage of a bill which, if it became a law, would be a destructive blow to the rapidly increasing commerce of our Virginia ports; and for the selfish advantage of a few tugboat owners she asks that Virginia be deprived of the power to control her own pilot laws and calls upon the Federal arm to do that which the State has done so well for more than a hundred years.

Mr. Speaker, I presume that the most extreme supporters of this bill will not deny the paramount necessity of a thorough and efficient system of pilotage as well for the protection of life and property as for the safety and advantage of trade and commerce. And it must further be admitted that such an efficiency can not be maintained unless the reward for the services rendered is sufficient to induce men who enter this vocation to devote their time and means to the arduous duties demanded of them. There can be no such thing as a voluntary pilot system. It must be supported either by salaries paid by the State or by fees imposed on those who need such service. The latter method of providing the necessary means to defray the cost of a pilotage system has been always deemed the better one, and exists in all the States of the Union. At one time the system of compulsory pilotage prevailed in every State on all vessels—American and foreign. At this day it is still continued in every port of the United States on the foreign marine, sail and steam. And this tax imposed on commerce is levied because an efficient pilot corps could not be had without it. If this were not true, if the efficiency of the system did not depend upon it, such a tax would be equally indefensible as applied to the shipping entering our ports from foreign nations as to our domestic trade.

Having this in view, no State has ever abrogated the compulsory feature in her pilot laws so far as it related to the coastwise vessel until it appeared evident that the fees collected from the foreign ship would be adequate to keep up the efficiency of the system. It has happened in several instances, in New York and Maryland, that the compulsory system has been prematurely repealed, and the result was so disastrous to commerce that in a few years the former law was restored by the legislature. The North Atlantic States have a very large foreign trade, and the fees arising from compulsory pilotage on foreign vessels are adequate for the support of their pilotage systems, while the nine States south of Maryland have not as yet sufficient foreign commerce to justify a reliance upon it alone for the maintenance of an efficient pilot service. In these States the statistics show that the pilot fees collected at their ports on coastwise sailing vessels average more than 50 per cent of the total fees. If this means of support were withdrawn from the Southern pilots, as this bill proposes to do, the pilotage systems at these ports would be seriously affected if not entirely destroyed, and their commerce, which is so rapidly increasing, would be driven away on account of the risks and danger of entering their harbors. I can conceive of no greater injury to the commercial prosperity of a nation than an unreliable, inefficient pilotage system.

It has been sought by the supporters of this bill to arouse prejudice against the brave, hard-working men who compose the pilot corps of the South by representing them as a close corporation, enjoying the enormous profits of a huge monopoly. Nothing can be more false than this. Reliable evidence produced before the committee having this bill in charge clearly shows that these men who have devoted their lives to this exacting, and ofttimes dangerous, occupation, who have invested their money in perfecting and keeping up this splendid service, get from it little more than a bare competency for themselves and their families. The pay received by these pilots averages not more than $1,200 apiece in the most favorable years, and sometimes it falls below this sum. Surely this can not be considered an excessive remuneration for the hard and perilous duties performed by these men. It must be remembered that these pilots are required by the State laws to do other work than simply bringing vessels in and out of port.

Under the law of Virginia they have to assist in quarantining our ports. They have to take any vessel with contagious disease on board to the nearest quarantine station, and are compelled to remain themselves in quarantine until the health officer releases the vessel. They often risk their own lives in seeking bravely to rescue those on a ship in peril, and thus they form a part of the life-saving service of this country. I have not time to read to this House the stringent laws of Virginia (which differ little, I believe, from those of other States) controlling and regulating the local pilotage system. They were passed with a single eye to securing and maintaining the efficiency of our service, and the legislative intent has been fully carried out.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I will close by stating what I regard as a conclusive reason why this bill should not pass. For more than a century this subject of pilotage has been safely and wisely left to the control of the several States. It has always been regarded as a proper subject for local regulation, and no one even now asserts that a general system would be beneficial. The Constitution of the United States by the act of 1789 referred this matter to the legislative discretion of the States, and except in one instance the Congress has declined to interfere with that discretion. State after State, as the exigencies arose, have amended, modified, or changed their regulations for the perfection of the pilotage system. The States have acted cautiously and wisely, in obedience to the local needs. Where it has been found possible without marring the efficiency of the service to reduce charges, to release certain classes of vessels from the pilotage tax, and to free commerce from all unnecessary restrictions, State legislatures have never failed to do so. Maine has acted on this subject in such manner as she deemed conducive to her own interests without the strong arm of the Federal Government being called on to interfere. We ask that Virginia be allowed also to exercise her discretion in this matter. With all the disaster and changes through which the old State has passed in these latter years, we still believe that her people have not lost the power of self-government, that she can be trusted as well as Massachusetts to protect the interests of her people and to decide what is best for her commerce and for the protection and safe conduct of the stranger who seeks her ports. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, how much time is remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Then that, of course, belongs to those in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida had one minute that was not assigned, but the two gentlemen to whom he assigned four minutes occupied five.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield all but five minutes of the remaining time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, pilotage is an instrumentality of commerce, and as such its regulation is exclusively under Federal control. The only way in which any State in the Union has been enabled to pass laws relating to pilotage within its jurisdiction has been by permission of Congress, given simply until Congress should choose to otherwise legislate.

Pilotage should be a matter of Federal legislation for the reason that it relates to the navigable waters that are under the exclusive control and jurisdiction of the United States. The object of pilotage is not to benefit pilots, but to facilitate and protect commerce; to benefit the great commercial interests of the nation.

Pilots are the servants of commerce, the servants of the commercial interests of the nation, and whatever is progressive in this direction must be adopted in and under national legislation. It is inevitable that our pilotage regulations and legislation should be progressive in this nation. It is astonishing that it has not been more so. In 1789, when the first pilotage laws were enacted, there were scarcely any light-houses marking the approach to the ports of the country. There were few beacons and buoys, and there had not been a single harbor improvement inaugurated from one end of the country to the other. There was not a vessel within the limits of the United States, nor even of the world, whose motive power was steam. It was inevitable that in the progress of events there should have arisen a necessity for some modification of the pilotage system.

In 1837 Congress stepped in and modified the system. In 1866 Congress stepped in and further modified the system. And beginning with 1852, and ending with 1871, there came that large mass of legislation having relation to the fact that the navigation of this country had been largely changed from propulsion by wind to propulsion by steam.

In 1871 there was finally enacted an important law relating to pilotage legislation. It provided that from and after that date any American vessel in the coastwise trade propelled by steam, when piloted by her master or mate or by a United States pilot, licensed as such, should be exempted from the payment of pilotage fees to State pilots whose services had not been used and were not needed.

This legislation marked a new era in pilotage regulations in this country. It was the nation stepping in and assuming its exclusive authority to regulate pilotage so far as this class of vessels was concerned.

It was objected then, when this legislation was had, that it would break down the pilotage system of the country. Nothing of the kind occurred. Less pilots were required at many points, greater economy of pilotage was secured, and the result was, that instead of breaking down the system it in point of fact strengthened it. Then followed legislation by all the Northern States, lately followed by Maryland, applying the same principle to American sailing vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, providing that where an American sailing vessel engaged in the coastwise trade shall be piloted by a United States licensed pilot, whether an officer of that vessel or the master of a tug towing that vessel, then that vessel shall not be required to pay fees to a State pilot whose services had not been used and were not needed.

To-day all the States in this Union but nine have applied to American coastwise sailing vessels precisely the rule that in 1871 was applied by Congress to all the steam vessels of the United Stated engaged in this trade. A discrimination had existed in all the States against American sailing vessels in the coastwise trade up to that time. All the States but nine have lifted this discrimination. The nine States which remain and still compel American sailing vessels in the coastwise trade to pay pilotage fees to pilots that they do not use and do not need are Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas; and the only reason that those States have not lifted this unnecessary and unjust burden is that in those States it so happens that there is very little tonnage owned. Hence there is no interest to oppose the pilotage lobby and secure what other States regard as just and proper legislation.

What reason is there, Mr. Speaker, that an American coasting vessel, piloted by its own officer, licensed by the same board which licenses a pilot for a steam vessel engaged in the same trade, or towed by a tug piloted by a United States pilot, when entering Pensacola, Fla., for example, thus entirely and sufficiently piloted for the protection of life and property, needing no further pilotage, should be met, when that vessel arrives at the wharf, by a State pilot, demanding, as in some cases, $70, $80, or $90 pilotage fee, when not a particle of service has been rendered by that pilot, and the tug which has rendered the service, piloted by a United States pilot, has actually piloted and brought that vessel in safely, expeditiously, and economically, and has been paid by the vessel for such service?

This is not a bill to abolish pilotage. It does not touch the question of compulsory pilotage at all. It simply provides that where a vessel is adequately piloted by a United States pilot who may be on board a tug guiding that vessel and towing it in, that then such vessel shall not be obliged to pay another fee to a State pilot who has not performed any service. It is simply a bill to abolish compulsory fees when no service is performed. If we were to judge of the merits of this bill as we judge other measures, there could be but one opinion respecting it. It is just; it removes a discrimination that exists without cause. It does for these nine States that have not moved forward in these years precisely what has been done by the legislatures of all the other States in the Union, and what was done twenty-five years ago for American vessels in the same trade. If this bill should pass, the law would then be the same as that which exists on the lakes in Wisconsin, in Michigan, in Ohio, in every Northern State.

You ask if the passage of this bill would increase danger to life and property. Not at all. There is not a Northern State but what is under the same principle as is provided in this bill with respect to pilotage. And yet there never was so efficient a system of pilotage as exists to-day in all these Northern States under precisely the principle enunciated by this bill. Moreover, every marine insurance company in Boston, which is the headquarters of marine insurance in this country, has petitioned for the passage of such a bill as this on the ground that there would be greater security to property and to persons under the policy proposed by this bill, whereby no one could collect pilotage fees unless he performed service. There is no inducement for a pilot to perform good service when he can collect pay whether he does anything or not. There is not a State in this Union—all but nine of whom have adopted the system provided in this bill—that would to-day go back to the old system. There is no necessity for it. It does not secure additional protection to life and property. It imposes an unnecessary expense and is contrary to all principles of equity. More than that, Mr. Speaker, it must be borne in mind that in the passage of a bill of this kind we simply put the two classes of coasting vessels engaged in the same trade upon precisely the same basis.

The only excuse that has been rendered for compelling American sailing vessels when piloted by a United States pilot, either attached to the vessel or in command of a tugboat towing such vessel into port, to pay a State pilot also for services not rendered or needed, is that such a contribution is necessary in order to maintain a system of pilotage in the nine Southern States for the use of vessels in the foreign trade.

If this were true—which it is not—then on what ground are steam vessels in the coastwise trade exempted from contributing their share? The sailing vessel is in competition with the steam vessel for freight in the coastwise trade, and if the former is to be compelled to contribute to maintain a pilotage system for vessels in the foreign trade, then, of course, justice requires that the latter shall no longer be exempted.

But why should not the vessels in the foreign trade support a system of State pilotage maintained for their benefit? Why should any American vessels in the coastwise trade be called upon to contribute to pilotage for foreign vessels?

There is no foundation, Mr. Speaker, for the claim that a pilotage system can not be maintained by the system proposed by this bill as well in the nine States of the South as in the North Atlantic States. We have been told that these Southern States have very little tonnage in the foreign trade entering and clearing from their ports. But this is not so. The entrances and clearances on the North Atlantic are more concentrated in the three ports of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston than they are in the South. Outside of these three ports the tonnage entered and cleared from Northern ports in the foreign trade is far less than similar tonnage in the South, arising from the fact that so large a proportion of Southern products—cotton, naval stores, and lumber—are exported.

Mr. Speaker, let me compare the statistics of tonnage entered and cleared from most Southern ports outside of Baltimore, New Orleans, and Galveston with the tonnage entered and cleared from the largest Northern ports outside of the three ports named:

Tonnage entered and cleared during the fiscal year 1893.

Port.	Tons.	Port.	Tons.
Key West	286,388	Beaufort, S. C	150,000
Pensacola	770,000	Portland	250,000
Mobile	390,000	New Bedford	17,000
Savannah	488,000	Bangor	18,000
Wilmington	120,000	Bath	2,250
Brunswick	280,000	Fall River	6,250
Charleston	190,000	Gloucester, Mass	27,000
Fernandina	100,000	New London, Conn	4,200
Newport News	208,000	New Haven	23,000
Norfolk	148,000

It will be seen from this table that the Northern ports outside of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston have far less foreign tonnage to maintain a pilotage system than the leading Southern ports outside of Baltimore, New Orleans, and Galveston. And yet these Northern ports have no difficulty in maintaining an efficient State pilotage system without compelling American vessels in the coastwise trade to pay pilotage fees to State pilots for services not rendered. Why can not Southern ports do the same?

There is not the slightest justification in the South for the continuation of their unjust pilotage laws. The suggestion that it leaves the obligation on State pilots to go out and offer their services to incoming vessels in the coastwise trade and takes away their compensation for going out when their services are not required has no foundation, for there will be no such obligation as to vessels in this trade. The obligation will only extend to the offering of services to vessels in the foreign trade.

There is not involved in this bill anything that relates to labor, as has been absurdly argued. I have been astonished to hear gentlemen talk about this bill having some relation to labor. What are the interests that are concerned in legislation relating to labor? Are men receiving $1,500 a year as pilots to be included in the ranks of labor enrolled in labor organizations? Not at all. It is the wage earners that we care for through labor organizations, and not a monopoly like this. If any labor organizations have been induced to protest against this bill they have certainly been grossly deceived as to its character.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the question is, shall we continue to discriminate against sailing vessels and in favor of steam vessels in the coastwise trade? Shall we still permit nine States to levy a tribute upon the shipowners of the other States for entering their ports, a tribute exacted often without one finger raised in return in the way of service? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] intimates that he might vote for this bill at a proper time, but thinks that this is not the proper time because of the general depression of wages throughout the country. He says we have waited twenty years and can wait a little longer. In that twenty years, Mr. Speaker, the 17,000 sailing vessels owned by citizens of
